Mr. KASSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means in its original form I interposed my objection to it. I could not vote for nor support any legislation which would have a tendency to impose upon the importing interest of this country any additional burden to that which they are now obliged to bear. While I am willing to go as far as any gentleman in the protection of the revenue which the law requires shall be collected upon the importations of the country, yet when we consider the intricate nature of our revenue laws, the inextricable confusion, the mysterious influences which affect the collection of the revenue under the present administration of the laws—in the port of New York, for instance—I am sure that gentlemen of the House, if they knew as much about it as I do, would conclude that it would be unjust to interpose any difficulties in the way of the collection of the revenue, or of the protection of the property of those upon whom these duties are levied.

Now what is the question presented in this bill? The laws are very difficult to understand and are continually being varied. In the case to which my friend referred, the word "fruit" was changed by the addition of the letter "s," and the revenue was thus deprived of hundreds of thousands of dollars. Now the case is this: the subordinate officers impose what, in their judgment, is the proper duty on the articles imported; the merchants pay under protest and take an appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, and if, in his judgment, the duty has been improperly or illegally collected, he draws his warrant and refunds the money. Now the fact may be, and I presume that it is, that by some influence beyond our comprehension the Secretary of the Treasury has, at times, been improperly induced to alter his previous decision, or the decision of his predecessor, and thus very large amounts of money have been drawn from the Treasury and put into the pockets, not altogether of the merchants who in the first instance paid the money, but of their attorneys, representatives, and brokers.

Now, the object of this bill is to provide that after the Secretary shall have once made his ruling there shall be no recourse except to the courts or to Congress for a restoration of the money claimed. Sir, I think there is a great deal of good to be accomplished by this. I think that the power of the Secretary of the Treasury is already enormous. It is too much to intrust to any one man in these times and at this day, however able and however upright he may be. I am therefore quite willing that after he has once ruled in a case of this kind there shall be no further action on his part to take money out of the Treasury when it has been paid into it, except by act of Congress or by a judicial decision; and if I understand this bill, that is its object.

Mr. KASSON. I yield now for a moment to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.]

Mr. BECK. This bill is reported unanimously by the Committee on Ways and Means after very careful consideration. The principal reason why I was anxious to support it was because it curtailed the powers of the executive officers of the Government over the money in the Treasury of the United States. I am one of those who believe that while executive officers should have all reasonable control over the affairs of their own Departments, and be enabled to furnish every facility to the merchants consistent with the proper security of the revenue, yet when they have once determined what the law is and the merchants have paid their money under that construction, no executive officer ought to put his hand into the Treasury of the United States and draw out money that has been put there by the people without either a judgment of a court or the action of the representatives of the people in Congress assembled. This bill only seeks to carry out that idea.

In the first place, collectors may differ in the construction of the law. The one at New York may decide that a certain amount of duty ought to be paid; the one at Boston may decide differently, and the collectors at Philadelphia and Baltimore may decide still differently. The Secretary should have a right to hear all these questions and determine what is the law and what men shall have their money refunded; but his decision should be final until the courts of the country have determined whether he is right or wrong, and then the money should be refunded according to the judgment of the courts; or else the Secretary, instead of refunding it on his own opinion, should lay the facts before Congress. In my judgment, sir, this bill will save millions of dollars to the tax-payers of the country, and will save the Secretary from very onerous duties; it will put the money of the people where it ought to be, under the control of the judiciary or of their representatives, and not leave it liable to be taken out of the Treasury as the Secretary may change his opinion. That is the whole object of the bill. The Committee on Ways and Means saw many other things and are considering many other things connected with the collection of customs. You have seen by a report laid on your tables the other day that within the last four years the collectors, naval officers, and surveyors at the ports of New York and Boston have received each as their share of penalties $450,000, or very nearly that sum.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Did you say $400,000?

Mr. BECK. Yes; or about that sum. There is a printed report upon our table now which shows that, and also shows that informers have received immense sums, amounting to $720,000, I believe. All sorts of fraud have crept into the collection of the customs revenue. I think the object of this bill should commend itself to everybody, to take out of executive control, when once a decision has been rendered, the question of refunding money, and refer it to a court, or to Congress.

Mr. KASSON. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] for a few minutes.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to say but a word or two to the House upon the pending bill, rather upon a collateral matter than upon the bill itself. I believe the Committee on Ways and Means were unanimously in favor of some legislation upon this subject, and agreed to report this bill.

There have been cases where, under the construction of the law by the Secretary of the Treasury, the merchants have paid duties for years; but protests were made, and the rights of the parties secured to a refunding of the money if they should bring suit within the requisite time. They have laid by their rights for some time, selling their goods to the community at a price that would reimburse them for the higher rate of duty. Then, after months, and perhaps years, have elapsed, they have brought their cases before the Secretary of the Treasury and have obtained a rebate of a portion of the duty they had paid, which was so much clear gain to them. So in the case referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] where the importer acknowledged to him that the rebate was a clear gain to him of $25,000.

Now, in regard to the particular decision referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] I think he is mistaken, and does injustice to the office of the Secretary of State. There was no such mistake as he intimates made in that office. I have sent for the original of the tariff bill that passed the House and came back from the Senate with an amendment containing the particular item referred to. If there was any mistake made it was made by a clerk of the Senate, and not by any of the Departments. It is a very natural mistake. According to my recollection it occurred in this way: we passed a bill repealing the tax on tea and coffee, and sent it to the Senate. The Senate amended it by adding an alphabetical free list, similar to the one that afterward became a law That free list included the heading "fruit," and after that heading the specification "bananas," &c. The Committee on Ways and Means reported the tariff bill which passed. It had a free list, and under the heading "fruit" a descriptive word as "perishable." The whole was stricken out in the House on the motion of the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. WALLS,] I think. Then the Senate substituted their free list containing this provision, "fruit, plants tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation." And it was adopted by the House as it is here, "fruits, plants, tropical and semi-tropical," &c., whether they understood it or not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Allow me to ask a question.

Mr. BURCHARD. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How can any man ever suppose that any fruits would be imported for propagation? Seeds, plants, &c., may be imported for propagation; but how fruits can be imported for propagation, I cannot understand.

Mr. BURCHARD. I am not attempting to give any construction or sense to the law, or to say what it means or does not mean. I took the floor simply to say that the Secretary of State was not to blame for this error, for it is an error that was in the bill when it passed the House.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to say that I had not supposed that the Secretary of State was personally to blame in any possible way.

Mr. BURCHARD. Or any clerk in his Department?

Mr. DAWES. I want to say, in reference to this matter, that I do not think this bill need be advocated on any suggestion that there has been any error on the part of the Secretary of State or the Secretary of the Treasury about the duty on fruit. The error does not lie there; it lies somewhere else. Those of us who drew the bill in relation to the tariff, to which reference has been made, know what we intended and how we left it. It is different in the enrolled copy of the bill in the office of the Secretary of State; and as it is there, I do not see how anybody can come to any different construction of it than is given by the Secretary of the Treasury on this matter of fruits. In the enrolled bill, in the free list, are these words: "fruits, plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation and cultivation." There is a comma after the word "fruits," and the Secretary of the Treasury is right in saying that under that wording fruits are to be admitted free of duty. And so in regard to the matter of paper in another part of the bill; as it stands in the enrolled bill, I do not see how the Secretary could come to any different conclusion. But it was not so when it left Congress. When the subject of the free list was under consideration my friend from Florida [Mr. WALLS] moved to strike out the whole paragraph under the heading "fruit," and his motion was carried. When the bill went to a committee of conference it was written in in this way: "fruit-plants," then a comma, there being a hyphen between "fruit" and "plants," and then the words "tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation," &c.; that was what was put in the report of the committee of conference. I have the Statutes here, printed by Little & Brown, from the enrolled bill in the State Department, and the statute is not printed as the enrolled bill reads. In this book the word is not "fruit" but "fruits." In the enrolled bill it is "fruits," with a comma following, and then come the words "plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation." So the Secretary was right in his decision; I do not see how it could be supposed that he was otherwise.

But, independently of the question whether the Secretary is right or not, I object to any Secretary having this power over the Treasury; to first put this construction upon an act as a judicial officer, and then draw his warrant to take out of the Treasury just what in his opinion may be due, leaving no mode open for the United States to bring the question before a court.

I wish it to be understood that I never have intended, in the remarks I have made at another time or now, to cast the slightest reflection upon the action of any Secretary of the Treasury in the administration of this law. This officer has exercised his authority in pursuance of a power which Congress has given him; but no man ought to be invested with the power to draw his warrant upon the Treasury in this manner. Congress, not the Secretary, should determine what amount shall be paid out of the Treasury.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, desires to say a few words on this question. I yield to him.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, it was clearly demonstrated to the committee, I think, that the present mode of administering the customs laws with reference to refunding duties supposed to have been improperly collected is very unsatisfactory; and for this reason I interposed no objection to the reporting of this bill. I have not examined the details of the measure carefully; but believing that something ought to be done to restrict the present power of the Secretary of the Treasury in this respect and to give uniformity and stability to the decisions of his Department, I was entirely willing that this measure should be tried as an experiment. Hence, though not prepared to defend the bill in all its details, which I have not examined, I interposed no objection to the reporting of the bill, and shall not object now to its passage.

Mr. POTTER. I wish to suggest a verbal correction in the bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. KASSON. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.]

Mr. MERRIAM. Mr. Speaker, my object in introducing this bill——

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I insist on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. This discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. KASSON. If objection is made, I will now, in compliance with requests made to me, take a vote of the House on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. POTTER. I want to call attention to one verbal correction.

Mr. KASSON. Objection is made to debate.

Mr. POTTER. This will not be objected to, I am sure.

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is that of the gentleman from Georgia, that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion, there were—ayes 38, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] to suspend the rules and pass the bill reported by him from the Committee on Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 29) to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain the amount of expense incurred by the territorial authorities of Dakota for arms, equipments, military stores, supplies, and all other expenses of the volunteer forces of the Indian war of 1862; and

An act (S. No. 367) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the State authorities of Rhode Island a certain gun.

CONTINENTAL CONGRESS CENTENNIAL.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, presented the following resolution; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration and the Proposed National Census of 1875:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the members of the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States will assemble in the Carpenters' Hall, Philadelphia, in informal joint session, on Monday, the 6th day of September, 1874, in centennial commemoration of the assembling of the delegates chosen and appointed by the several Colonies and Provinces in North America, to meet and hold a Congress in Philadelphia in that hall, on Monday, the 5th day of September, 1774; and that the Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE, Speaker of the House of Representatives, be invited to preside over the meeting, and the Hon. HENRY WILSON, Vice-President of the United States, be requested to deliver an address appropriate to the occasion.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that this bill be printed, together with testimony and tabular statements in reference to it; that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made a special order for Wednesday morning next, after the morning hour.

Mr. WOODFORD. Will the effect of that be to give this bill precedence over the consideration of the bill legalizing the issue of the reserve of $44,000,000?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that bill was made a special order subordinate to general appropriation bills. The Calendar, which is incorrectly made up, does not so state; but the Journal shows the fact.

Mr. WOODFORD. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this House will give its attention, first of all, to the bill which is to settle the status of the reserve.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has the impression (and the Clerk confirms it) that the bill referred to by the gentleman was made a special order subject to the precedence of general appropriation bills.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was.

Mr. WOODFORD. The business interests of the country require that we shall settle, first of all, what is the status of the $44,000,000 reserve. On that hangs every business enterprise in all the land, and it is the duty of this House to meet that question first of all and settle it, and settle it forever.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make my motion that the bill be made the special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for Wednesday next, after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of making the bill the special order in Committee of the Whole after the morning hour on Wednesday next, from day to day until disposed of, will vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WOOD. Let me suggest, before the vote is taken, that this large bill can scarcely be printed by Wednesday morning next.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is in type now, and the corrections will be made to-night, and the bill will be printed and on our tables to-morrow morning.

Mr. WOOD. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he proposes to make this bill the special order exclusive of all other special orders, exclusive of the tax bill and the forty-four million reserve bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will consult the wishes of the House when the bill comes up as to what disposition shall be made of it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has sent for the Journal to ascertain precisely the status of the various special orders.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am informed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, that they were so made special orders on the motion of the gentleman himself.

The SPEAKER. Then, if they were made special orders in subordination to regular appropriation bills, this will be considered in advance of them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will not antagonize the wishes of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then put the question.

Mr. WOODFORD. If this be made the special order it will then be put ahead of the forty-four million bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. But the House can at any time set it aside.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; you cannot do that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to know exactly what the House wishes to have done in reference to this bill.

The SPEAKER. It can go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take its place on the general Calendar.

Mr. MAYNARD. There are matters of general legislation which should first be attended to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let us get through with the other bills first.

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe I have the floor. I ask for a division of the House on the motion that the bill be made a special order for Wednesday next, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is that to be to the exclusion of all other special orders?

Mr. GARFIELD. I leave that to the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is not what you say, but what the rules say.

Mr. GARFIELD's motion was rejected.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move now that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to go on the general Calendar, and that the bill and accompanying report be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state what the status of the bill will then be. It is to be preferred to all other bills on the general Calendar, but not to bills which have been made special orders.

Mr. COX. That is the order already made.

The SPEAKER. Appropriation bills, if referred without being made special orders, are to be preferred, and tax bills in time of war, even if not made special orders.

Mr. MAYNARD. It stands on the Calendar subject to the general rule of the House.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but that is the general rule of the House.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER. All points of order will be reserved.

The bill and accompanying report were then ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

And then, on motion of Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, (at twenty minutes to five o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

By Mr. WOOD: The petition of Edmund Woog for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 17, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, of Washington.

On motion of Mr. FENTON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, of the operations of that service during the year ending November 1, 1873; a motion to print which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SCHURZ. I beg leave to present the petition of several banks and prominent business men of Saint Louis, respectfully representing that they view with alarm the propositions before Congress for increasing the volume of United States notes; that they believe that any additional issue of paper money by the Government would be most injurious to the interests of the nation; that the country is now suffering, and has been for the past twelve years, great loss and inconvenience arising from an irredeemable currency. The petitioners beg leave to represent most earnestly that the resumption of specie payments at the earliest practicable time is imperatively required by the interests of the nation, and they most respectfully deprecate the issue of any more legal-tender notes, as such a proceeding would be understood as postponing indefinitely a return to a sound financial condition. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of Mrs. Hester Stoll, widow of Urbin Stoll, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of the Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance of the State of Rhode Island, signed by W. D. Hilton and other officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented the petition of the Methodist Episcopal church, of Blairstown, New Jersey, signed by the pastor and other officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of D. K. Blaine and other citizens of Beaver County, Pennsylvania, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of the Yellow Frame Presbyterian church of the Newton Presbytery of the State of New Jersey, signed by Rev. R. B. Foresman, pastor, and other officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CRAGIN. I have received several memorials which I will present to the Senate in relation to the Nautical Almanac: one from the American Philosophical Society, at Philadelphia; another from the Academy of Natural Sciences, at Philadelphia; another from certain citizens of Philadelphia; another from the Franklin Institute; and I may be pardoned if I simply read the preamble and resolution of the Franklin Institute, as they are very brief:

Whereas the Franklin Institute learns with much regret of the intention of the Government, at Washington, to curtail the amount of appropriations for the United States Nautical Almanac; and whereas, in the opinion of this Institute, the Nautical Almanac is one of the most practically useful of those efforts of American science which stand before the world unsurpassed by any other nation; and whereas, in the economy of the management of this great national work, as well as in the accuracy of the details which it furnishes, the Nautical Almanac is an object of pride to our citizens, a necessity for our commerce, and a model to other countries: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Franklin Institute respectfully petitions Congress rather to increase than to diminish the appropriation for an object so catholic, so necessary, and so creditable to the country.

As the Committee on Appropriations have reported the naval appropriation bill, I move that these memorials lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the memorial of certain loyal citizens of Kentucky, asking an appropriation to Mrs. Vaughan and Mrs. Jackman of $25,000 each for patriotic services rendered the Government during the late rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of Hans W. Phillips, Clark Hanes, and John Beam, of Wheeling, West Virginia, praying compensation for five-eighths of the steamer Planter, alleged to have been captured by the rebels in the port of Mobile, condemned and sold as a prize; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE presented the petition of the Board of Trade of Mobile, praying for an appropriation to complete the opening of the bars in Mobile Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Mobile, praying for an appropriation to organize the United States mint at New Orleans; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of George W. Stuart, praying compensation for services rendered to R. H. Rousseau while minister to Honduras; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of John B. Perry, praying that a national convention may be called to meet at Philadelphia on the 4th of July, 1876, to make a declaration of peace—"peace on earth, good will to men." I have some doubt about the reference which should be given to this petition, but I move that it go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Division No. 263 of the Sons of Temperance of the State of New York, signed by its officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of the members of the congregation of the Reformed church of Newark, New Jersey, signed by Rev. William J. R. Taylor, pastor, and other officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Vineland, Cumberland County, New Jersey, praying that a pension may be granted to Rhoda Hart, widow of Phœbus Hart, and mother of Lewis Hart, who died while in the service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORDON. I present the petition of S. E. Allen and 44 others, who claim that they were entitled to 20 per cent. additional compensation for services in the Treasury Department under the joint resolution of February 28, 1867. It seems that their petition was not allowed by the Court of Claims. They now represent that the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the decision of the Court of Claims, and they ask to be restored to their position in that court. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented a letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, accompanying a copy of a report of Inspector E. C. Kemble in relation to the condition of the Indians of the Siletz agency, in Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CUSTOMS-REVENUE SERVICE.

Mr. FENTON. I present a petition in regard to the customs-revenue service, and upon which I should be glad to submit a few remarks. This petition is signed by merchants of New York, generally, and I do not know but all of them importers. I will take the liberty to read a sentence from their petition which presents the case better than any words of mine could do. They say:

Deeply impressed with the importance of reform in the customs-revenue service of the country, including the practices of agents, informers, and officials, and of the reduction of the enormous sums received as salaries and perquisites, we respectfully urge early and favorable action upon the bill of Senator FENTON, "to regulate the service in the collection of customs at the various ports of entry in the United States, and the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to customs, and for other purposes." We believe this bill, should it become a law, would remedy in a great measure the evils of which we have just reason to complain.

Mr. President, the bill to which these petitioners refer was presented to the Senate a little more than two years ago, and referred to the Committee on Finance. That committee, after consultation with many persons who were familiar with the customs-revenue service of the country, and who were competent to advise, and with officers of the Treasury Department, and especially with the then Secretary of the Treasury, reported the bill, very little changed, to the Senate. I was unanimously instructed by the committee to ask for early action upon it.

The bill thus perfected, as we believe, proposed to equalize, or rather to adjust upon the basis of salaries, the compensation of customs officers, so that those occupying principal positions whose services in any other department of human activity would be considered at least amply compensated at $5,000 or $10,000 a year, should not have the opportunity of making from $75,000 to $100,000 a year, as now. It also proposed to sweep away the whole system of moieties, the evils of which are a grievous burden, indeed one of the greatest afflictions to American trade. I am justified in saying that this moiety business, supplemented by the act of March 2, 1867, authorizing the seizure of books and papers, is the source of numberless extortions and iniquities on the part of the custom-house officers, agents, and informers.

The bill also proposed to simplify the whole customs-revenue machinery, so that the importer upon the one hand, and the Government upon the other, whose interests are identical, should be fairly and faithfully protected.

Mr. President, I endeavored again and again, in vain, to secure the favorable attention of the Senate to the bill thus reported. I was met first by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, the chairman of the Committee on Retrenchment, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM,] with the statement that that committee had in charge the investigation of New York customs-service affairs, and that delay was important, to the end that the light of their observation, when their report was submitted, should be cast upon the subject. Unfortunately, their report lingered until the last days of the session, and the bill was not reached.

At the last session I made further efforts to bring the bill before this body, and I was there met by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. CHANDLER,] speaking for that committee, that they thought it was a subject that properly should go before the Committee on Commerce. Finally, despairing of securing action otherwise, I moved its reference to that committee. But two months passed of that session, and it slumbered, so far as the Senate knew, in the pigeonholes of the committee-room.

Again, at the beginning of this session, on the very first day, I moved the reference of this bill to the Committee on Commerce. Is it too much to ask now, is it too much to expect, that the committee will soon report the bill, or something better if they can? I at least join my voice with these memorialists, in the hope that the grave abuses, of which few can now plead ignorance, may be uprooted and destroyed. They are, to say the least, a reproach upon our Government, and no person or party in authority can longer afford to be indifferent to the demand for reform which now comes to us from so many quarters.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM subsequently said: In rising to ask leave to introduce a bill, I wish to say a word in reference to a remark made by the Senator from New York [Mr. FENTON] this morning. He referred to a committee of which I was chairman, and which was in existence some two years ago, and stated, in substance, that action was delayed on a bill in which he felt particularly interested on the ground that the committee authorized to investigate certain charges at the custom-house in New York had the matter under consideration and hoped to make some report upon it. He stated, in substance, that that report was delayed so long that no proper action could be taken by the Senate. I do not suppose he really intended that we should infer that he charged us with unnecessary delay.

Mr. FENTON. No, Mr. President; I remarked that unfortunately the report did not reach us until the closing days of that session. I made no reflection on the committee.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I beg leave to say that there was no want of diligence on the part of that committee, or any member of that committee; and there was no reason why that report should not have been made before except that there was actually no time. That is all I have to say on that subject.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BOREMAN, it was Ordered, That C. S. Bell have leave to withdraw the papers filed with his memorial heretofore referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Sarah F. Staples, in behalf of the heirs of the late John Ross, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. PRATT, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Samuel Johnson, of New Orleans, praying compensation for the use of, and occupancy by the United States of, certain houses and lots in that city from July, 1862, to October, 1865, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of the officers of the Seventh Cavalry, praying for compensation for loss of property caused by the burning of their quarters at Fort Buford, Dakota Territory, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 379) for the relief of Nathan Cole, late captain Twenty-third Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1224) for the relief of William J. Denniston, late an acting lieutenant Seventieth New York Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported an amendment by way of substitute for the bill (S. No. 320) to increase the Pay Department of the Army, reported from the committee on the 3d instant.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of T. T. Garrard and others, claiming compensation for the destruction of their salt, salt-wells, &c., in Clay County, Kentucky, by United States troops, in 1862, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 496) for the relief of those suffering from the destruction of the salt-works near Manchester, Kentucky, pursuant to the orders of Major-General Carlos Buell.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 171) for the benefit of the legatees of Asbury Dickins, deceased, have instructed me to report the same back with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed. This is accompanied with a written report, and as I believe one of the members of the committee desires to submit the views of the minority, and a bill on the same subject has passed the other House, I suppose it may go on the Calendar.

The report was ordered to be printed, and the bill to be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to submit the views of the minority of the committee on that case, and ask that they be printed with the report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of a committee of the American Institute of Homeopathy asking an extension of the signal service so as to obtain information for the benefit of the public health, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. SPENCER. I am also instructed by the same committee to ask that the petition of William McCarrick, praying for arrears of bounty, be recommitted to the committee for further consideration, as some new evidence has been presented in the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 108) to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 342) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States ships Wyoming and Ta Kiang, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CRAGIN. The committee make no written report at this session in this case, adopting the report made at the last session of the last Congress.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Silas Hurd, Seth Hurd, and others, of Connecticut, praying to be allowed compensation for damages for certain injuries to their "fishing place" by persons in the employment of the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of George Reisinger, of Oregon, praying for a pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 497) to repeal the fourteenth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1871," approved July 15, 1870; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BOGY. I desire this bill to be in lieu of the bill introduced by me yesterday. I also move that the memorial which I presented yesterday on the same subject be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I see by the RECORD this morning that it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. My intention was to have had it referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I move now that the memorial be withdrawn from the Committee on the Judiciary and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs with this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Missouri state to what matter this relates? The formal reference to a section of a law does not give us the substance.

Mr. BOGY. It is in relation to some lands located in what is called the Black Bob reservation in Kansas — the Shawnee reservation. Those lands were surveyed many years ago and patented to the Indians. The condition of the patent was that they could not be alienated. Since then it has become a matter of necessity for these lands to be disposed of and go into the hands of white settlers who are there now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 498) to repeal a certain portion of the pension laws, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 499) to authorize the issue of a supply of arms to the authorities of the State of Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 500) for the relief of Dr. John B. Read; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 501) providing for the appointment of two members of the Senate and three of the House of Representatives on the board of examiners to the Naval Asylum; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 502) for the relief of Mrs. Martha Vaughn and Mrs. Louisa Jackman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PRATT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 503) for the relief of Susan R. Moore, the relative and legatee of Phœbe Schofield, a pensioner; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 504) for the relief of certain homestead and pre-emption settlers on the public lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARPENTER (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 505) to further protect the polls in the election of President, Vice-President, and members of Congress; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 505) to amend "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1849, and for other purposes," approved July 29, 1848; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TIMBER AND HEDGES ON WESTERN PRAIRIES.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to consider the expediency of further legislation on the subject of encouraging the planting and cultivation of timber and hedges on the western prairies, and particularly whether it would not be expedient to amend the homestead law so as to deduct from the time required to perfect homestead title a reasonable number of months for each acre of timber and mile of hedge planted and cultivated thereon.

THE BANKING SYSTEM.

Mr. BOGY. I offer the following resolution, which I will read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and is hereby, directed to inquire into the expediency of providing that hereafter all banks shall be chartered or organized by the States, each State to decide the question as to the number of banks and capital required for its legitimate wants, and each State to provide such guarantees to depositors as may be deemed proper; all banks to be organized under the provisions of a law requiring the deposit of bonds as now provided for national banks; the Federal Government to have the keeping of such bonds and the issuing of the currency, and to be responsible for the redemption of the circulation.

I am in favor, Mr. President, of a free-banking law. At the same time I can very well understand that a free-banking law may lead to very great financial troubles hereafter. It may cause very wild operations, beyond all question. Nevertheless, between the present restrictive system, confining the amount of circulation which shall be used by this entire nation to a given amount of money, and opening the question wide to an unlimited amount of money—of the two evils, I would prefer the latter; recognizing one as well as the other, however, to be an evil.

Now, sir, without detaining the Senate any length of time, it does seem to me that in leaving the question to the States we are putting back the great question of the creation of banks where it originally belongs, to the States, and not in the Federal Government. There are States that require and want no banking circulation. California has as a basis gold and silver; so has Nevada, so has Oregon.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BOGY. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is this a question on the presentation of a petition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the offering of a resolution. The Senator from Missouri has given notice that he desired to offer a resolution, which he has read, upon which he is commenting.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I feel at liberty to raise this question, because my honorable friend, I know, will not suspect me of any desire to take him off the floor on any occasion. But, Mr. President, I think a practice is growing up here, and indeed has grown up recently, of addressing the Senate upon the presentation, or offer to present, of resolutions and petitions, which, it seems to me, is a very great hinderance to business, especially the business of the morning hour; and, therefore, I feel quite at liberty to raise the question at this time as to the regularity of this proceeding. I raise the question of order whether the Senator from Missouri is proceeding in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour is undoubtedly intended, under the rules, for business, not debate; and the remarks of the Senator from Missouri are out of order if objected to by any Senator. But this sort of debate has grown up within the last year or two, and has proceeded by common consent, so that the Chair does not feel at liberty to call a Senator to order; but on objection made by any Senator, the Chair will rule that all debate is out of order. The Senator from Maine objects, and the Chair will rule that further debate is out of order.

Mr. CONKLING. Merely for the sake of personal, individual information, I inquire of the Chair, under what rule or rules of the Senate debate on presenting a petition is out of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So far as the present occupant of the chair is informed, the rules are almost silent about morning business. There is nothing about the morning hour in the rules that the present occupant of the chair can find. But the practice of the Senate, as he is informed, has been, until very recently, to devote the morning hour to business, and not to debate.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Chair and the Senator from Missouri will indulge me in a remark, I beg to say that I have no doubt the Chair is quite warranted, by a reference to recent times, in his remark that the practice of the Senate has been as stated; but I think the history of the Senate will not vindicate the statement of the Chair. I had occasion recently to turn over a volume of the speeches of Mr. Webster, and I was surprised to see the length of the remarks submitted by Mr. Webster when a member of this body upon presenting petitions, and often petitions not among the gravest which were presented. I think the history of former times will show that that was quite the practice. My recollection of the rule is that it requires that, previous to a petition being read, if it is read, a brief statement shall be made of the substance of the petition; and I know of no other rule bearing upon the question. I am very glad attention has been called to this matter, and I think it is very well to have an understanding about it; and I am inclined to think the Senator from Missouri is quite within the written rules of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My object was, more than anything else, to call the attention of the Senate to what I regard as a practice certainly not in harmony with the proper transaction of the business of the Senate; and having done that, as my honorable friend from Missouri is probably prepared to make a statement of his views at this time, I will not raise the question of order, but I give notice, so that nobody need be taken by surprise that hereafter, with a view of bringing the attention of the Senate to this practice, I will raise this question.

Mr. CONKLING. Is this a resolution which the Senator is debating?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I beg to take back as much of what I said as grew out of my misapprehension. I supposed the Senator was speaking to a petition. If it is a resolution, undoubtedly the rule prevails that one objection would compel it to lie over; and if it lies over, of course it is not in order to debate it. I supposed the Senator from Missouri was speaking to a petition.

Mr. BOGY. I had really got through my remarks. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has now been sent to the desk, and it will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Upon that point, the resolution having been received by general consent, the question that is now under consideration of the Senate is debatable, I presume.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then it seems to me that the Senator from Missouri was quite in order. He offered a resolution, and moved its reference; and upon that motion, it seems to me, he had a right to address the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Missouri to move its reference. He gave notice that he desired to introduce a resolution, which he said he would read. Having read it he proceeded to debate it. He did not offer it; it was not sent to the table; it was not reported to the Senate; and he did not ask for its present consideration at that time.

Mr. ANTHONY. The reason why I made the remark was that I was pronounced out of order, not by the Chair, but by some Senators, the other day, for doing precisely the thing which the Senator from Missouri has done, and which I think he has done in order, if he removed a reference.

Mr. BOGY. The Chair misunderstood. I moved the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not so understand. If that is so he was mistaken as to the status of the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not mean to arraign the decision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In addition to that the Chair would remind the Senate that no motion can be made on a resolution until it is sent to the desk and is under consideration by the Senate. Previous to that time a motion to refer would be out of order.

Mr. BOGY. The Chair will indulge me, as I am one of the youngest Senators in the body.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg to state that it was not my purpose to arraign the decision of the Chair, but to refer to a similar proceeding on my own part some days ago, which several Senators thought was out of order; but I believe the Chair thought I was in order at that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore subsequently said: The Chair desires to state, in regard to the resolution which was offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] that the Senator finally asked its present consideration, and the Chair was in the act of putting the vote when the Senator from Rhode Island rose, and the Chair awarded him the floor. The Chair will now again submit the question on agreeing to that resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LIQUOR-TRAFFIC COMMISSION.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 161, to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic.

Mr. SCHURZ. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Iowa. The consideration of the bill was objected to yesterday by the Senator from Connecticut, not now in his seat, [Mr. FERRY,] and he thereby indicated that he desired to debate it; and he being not now here, I suggest to the Senator from Iowa to let the bill go over for the present.

Mr. WRIGHT. If it can be understood that the bill shall not lose its place on the Calendar, I shall not object to the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By order of the Senate made yesterday, this bill is placed at the head of the Calendar, and will remain there.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then I shall not object to the postponement, for the reason suggested by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

TITLES OF NAVAL ENGINEERS.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 269) to change the titles of certain naval officers.

Mr. WEST. I must appeal to the Chair that that is not the next bill on the Calendar. A bill has gone by twice, yesterday and to-day, to make room for this one; and the Senator from Iowa consents that we shall take it up and act upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana is mistaken as to the matter of fact. Senate bill No. 269 was laid aside yesterday, because the chairman of the committee that reported it was not in his place. It was objected to and laid aside; and each morning the call of the Calendar commences at the point where it left off the day before.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 269) to change the titles of certain naval officers.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the bill, with an amendment to strike out the words "and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith be, and are hereby, repealed," and to insert as section 2 the following:

SEC. 2. That from and after the 13th day of June, 1874, the course of instruction at the Naval Academy for cadet engineers shall be four years, instead of two as now provided by law; and this provision shall first apply to the class of cadet engineers entering the Academy in the year 1874, and to all subsequent classes; and that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CRAGIN. I will state that this amendment is simply extending the term at the Naval Academy of cadet engineers from two years to four, so as to make it correspond with the change made last year in relation to cadet midshipmen—the law also requiring two yeas'r sea-service; this will make six years, the same as in the case of cadet midshipmen. It is all right, and is recommended by the Department; and I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN. There is a verbal correction that should be made in the first line of section 2. The date should be "30th" of June, instead of "13th." That is a typographical error, I presume.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. CRAGIN. I am instructed to offer a slight amendment to the first section, to which I am sure there will be no objection. After the word "engineer," in the last line, I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the regulations of the Navy Department in relation to examinations, and amount of sea-service previous to such examinations, be complied with.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CRAGIN the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to change the titles of certain naval officers, and for other purposes."

ROBERT N. M'MILLAN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1041) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to adjust and settle the account of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana, and to allow him the sum of $706.56, being the amount paid for salaries of keepers and assistant keepers of lighthouses for the first quarter of the year 1861.

Mr. WEST. I am not aware whether there is a report in this case, but I can briefly explain to the Senate the circumstances. This Mr. McMillan in 1861 was the United States light-house superintendent for that district, and was compelled by stress of circumstances in disbursing this amount of $706 to take receipts in the name of the Confederate States of America, and he was not credited by the United States on his bonds for that amount. The bill does not require any money from the Treasury, but merely enables him to adjust his accounts.

Mr. CONKLING. How is he entitled to credit? I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. WEST. He was obliged in paying the money to the employés in the Light-House Department to take receipts in the name of the Confederate States of America, as all the officers in the Southern States were compelled to do at that time. He used the United States money.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCIOTHA BRASHEARS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 361) granting a pension to Sciotha Brashears, late of the Seventeenth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry; which was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sciotha Brashears, late of the Seventeenth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry, at the rate of eight dollars per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MATTHEW WOODRUFF.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, late first sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Volunteers; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. BOGY. I ask that the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted, by Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, on the 23d of January:

The petition shows that the petitioner enlisted June 15, 1861, served honorably and without absence or furlough until about March, 1864, when he was discharged by reason of re-enlistment as a veteran, receiving then the usual furlough with his regiment; that he served faithfully as first sergeant of his company until about the 2d of April, 1866, nearly a year after the surrender of the enemy, when receiving intelligence of his brother's death, and being called home to administer to the comfort of a dependent father and sisters, one of whom was a helpless invalid and dependent upon public charity, he, being unable to obtain a furlough, left his command at Mobile, Alabama, without leave and proceeded home. Returning to his command after an absence of twenty-six days, he met his regiment on the way to Saint Louis, it having been mustered out of service. All the papers having been turned over, the rolls could not be altered, and hence he was reported as a deserter.

It was not his intention to desert, the war being over, but to return to his command, his absence being temporary and brought about by the fortuitous circumstances stated.

Lieutenant-Colonel Best, of his regiment, and other officers, corroborate this statement, and speak in the highest terms of his long, arduous, and exemplary service as a good soldier. Colonel Best, while admitting the petitioner did wrong, urges that the circumstances were extenuating, and recommends proper relief; and the proof shows the petitioner was severely wounded at the battle of Fort Blakely, Alabama, April 9, 1865, from which he now suffers, and that he was brave and gallant, participating in all the battles in which his regiment was engaged.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OLIVER POWERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 366) for the relief of Oliver Powers; which was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill declares that Oliver Powers, of Company K, Tenth Tennessee Cavalry, shall be allowed pay as private from the 15th day of February, 1864, to the day of the muster-out and discharge of that company, together with such bounties and allowances as would have been due him by law had his name remained on the rolls of his company.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 5) to provide for the adjustment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. PRATT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid aside.

EXPORT BOND OF JOHN S. MILLER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 483) to authorize the cancellation of an export bond for a portion of the distilled spirits of John S. Miller, on board of bonded cars of the United States; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, on the production of proof satisfactory to him of the destruction by fire of fifty barrels of alcohol without fraud, collusion, or negligence on the part of John S. Miller, the owner of the alcohol, while the same was in the custody of the United States, in bonded cars at Sterling, Illinois, in transitu for export to Buenos Ayres, in South America, on or about the 18th of August, 1872, to cancel such bonds as may have been given for the exportation of the alcohol so destroyed; but bonding certificates are to be produced showing the bonding, as required by the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, of all alcohol or distilled spirits except the fifty barrels destroyed by fire included in these bonds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALONZO V. RICHARDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 100) for the relief of Lieutenant Alonzo V. Richards; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Paymaster-General to pay Alonzo V. Richards, late second lieutenant in the Signal Corps, United States Army, the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of that corps from the 22d of March, 1864, to the 10th of May, 1865, less the pay of a sergeant of the corps, received by him during that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INQUIRY INTO CAUSES OF EPIDEMIC CHOLERA.

The next business on the Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 29) authorizing the Secretary of War to detail medical officers of the Army to inquire into, and report upon, the causes of epidemic cholera; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Military Affairs proposed to amend the joint resolution so as to make it read:

Whereas epidemic cholera prevailed during the year 1873 in various parts of the United States, especially in the valley of the Mississippi, causing deplorable mortality; and whereas it is highly important that whenever such epidemics occur, the facts concerning the spread of the disease and its mode of propagation should be ascertained as fully as possible, with a view to the prevention or limitation of future outbreaks: Therefore,

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to detail one medical officer of the Army, who shall, during the present year, under the direction of the Surgeon-General of the Army, in connection with the supervising surgeon of marine hospitals, acting under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, visit the towns at which cholera prevailed during 1873, or such of them as, in the opinion of the Surgeon-General and Secretary of the Treasury, may be necessary, confer with the health authorities and resident physicians of such towns, and collect, so far as possible, all facts of importance with regard to such epidemic, and shall make a detailed report of the information collected on or before the 1st day of January, 1875, to the President, to be submitted to Congress.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed, and the joint resolution read the third time.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that this joint resolution be changed to a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that this being a House resolution, it is not usual to make the change, because it would interfere with the keeping of the records of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I ask that the title be changed so as to conform to the body of the resolution.

Mr. STOCKTON. Do I understand this resolution to be reported by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. STOCKTON. I should like to inquire of that committee whether the Secretary of War needs an act of Congress to authorize him to detail an Army surgeon to go to any town in this country; and that seems to be the whole object of the act.

Mr. LOGAN. Under the law the Secretary of War cannot detail a surgeon to perform any duty except Army duty. This is duty outside of the regular line of a surgeon's Army duty; and for that reason it requires an act of Congress.

Mr. STOCKTON. That was the simple question I wished to ask. If that is the opinion of the committee, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not think there is any doubt about the law in that particular.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be amended as suggested by the Senator from Illinois, by striking out the words "medical officers," and inserting, "a medical officer."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2073) restricting the refunding of customs duties and prescribing certain regulations of the Treasury Department; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1284) authorizing the chief clerk of the War Department to sign requisitions on the Treasury during the temporary absence of the Secretary of War.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870; and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President——

Mr. MERRIMON. I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment is not in order at the present time. The motion is to recommit the bill to the committee.

Mr. MERRIMON. But I wish to make an amendment to that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be out of order.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to be heard on that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly, the Chair will hear the Senator. If the proposition is to instruct the committee, it is in order.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order undoubtedly, but the Chair did not understand the Senator as proposing to do that.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to amend the motion to recommit by providing—

That the committee be, and they are hereby, instructed to report, as soon as practicable, a bill providing for the increase of the national-bank circulation, so that the whole volume thereof shall not exceed $400,000,000.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, when on yesterday afternoon I took the floor, it was with no purpose on my part to make a speech on the subject now before the Senate; and if any one supposed from my having the floor at the time of the adjournment that that was my intention, I wish to undeceive him at once. At the time of the adjournment the question before the Senate was on recommitting this bill, on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. BUCKINGHAM.] The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] now proposes to amend that, by recommitting the bill with instructions.

I think it not unimportant that we recur to the history of this question in the Senate at the present session.

It will be remembered that some weeks since a resolution was offered by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and purporting to come from that committee, instructing it to bring in a bill looking, as I term it, to conditional resumption. That was followed by an amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] looking to absolute or unconditional resumption. That was moved to be amended by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] by a proposition looking to an increase of currency, either in greenbacks or national-bank paper. His proposition was general, looking to an increase in currency. We discussed that question some two or three weeks, the object being to obtain a vote upon one or all of these propositions, that the Committee on Finance might have some instructions, some guide—know somewhat of the course they should take.

I deem it not improper here to say—I do not think that I do more than is my duty, nor yet reveal anything improper in the action of the committee—that I was opposed to this proceeding. My preference was that we should report a bill to the Senate covering as far as possible the general subject, which being before the Senate and discussed, when we reached a vote and disposed of it we should reach a practical result. I remember that I maintained then, as I do now, that after we had had all the discussion upon the general propositions, and the committee were then instructed generally and brought in our bill, we should have the same discussion over again, and that it were better that we reported a bill at once. When it was said to me, "We can probably not agree upon a bill now," I said, "We can agree upon a bill as well as upon this resolution," because we did not agree upon that. However, the proposition was presented to the Senate, amendments were suggested, as I have already stated, and we had the discussion.

Now, I submit to the Senate, what would have been thought of a proposition to recommit that resolution in the midst of that discussion, when the very object of the committee in presenting the resolution was to obtain the sense of the Senate upon the general question? If the resolution had been recommitted, the committee would have been no wiser, would have had no instructions to aid or assist them, any more than when they reported the resolution. That resolution, however, was laid aside, and the bill now before the Senate was brought to our attention. Contrary to the expectation of the committee, it was proposed here, as it is now, to ingraft upon that bill some matters that are outside of its general purport.

The bill, it will be remembered, only provides, as has been said here, for carrying out an existing statute to provide for the redistribution of $25,000,000 of national-bank currency. It was supposed by the committee that we could possibly, by introducing that bill and getting action upon it, accomplish what everybody conceded was but proper, so far as concerned the circulation of the banks provided for by existing statutes. I say, however, that contrary to what was expected amendments have been proposed to that bill which bring up the general subject whether we shall have an increase of currency, whether we shall have an addition to the banking circulation in a limited amount, or whether we shall have an increase in the way of free banking. All of these questions, and more, are before the Senate.

When the subject is in this condition, and before any vote has been taken by the Senate, it is proposed to recommit this bill. It appears to me that if there was any policy in introducing the original resolution for the purpose of obtaining the sense of the Senate, if it was important to the committee that they should have an expression of the sentiment of the Senate on that subject, it is equally important that we should have it now; and to ask that this bill shall be recommitted before we have an expression from the Senate is, it seems to me, to admit that we have had these four, five, or six weeks of debate without accomplishing any practical result. I therefore think, and I submit to the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the friends of either side of this proposition, whether it be conditional or absolute resumption, or for an increase of currency, that it were better that we have an expression of the Senate on the questions involved, and when we have such expression, then I think no one would object that the bill should be recommitted, if it was deemed necessary or advisable for the purpose of perfecting its details. When we have had such an expression, I have no doubt the committee would carry out the sense of the Senate, whatever might be the views of individual members of the committee on the subject that was committed to them. I therefore shall oppose the motion to recommit at this time. I think it but fair in view of what has taken place here; I think it but fair in view of what was asked by the committee; I think it but fair in view of what are known to be the views of members of the committee, that the Senate should give some expression to its views, and act either upon this bill or upon some other bill before the subject is recommitted to the committee. It seems to me that that is logical also. It seems to me that if we recommit this bill at this time, without any expression of sentiment, it will necessarily follow that the committee, not having any instructions from the Senate, being divided upon the subject, will be unable to agree upon a bill, and the question will be left in such a condition that it will be impossible to tell where we shall bring up, impossible to tell whether we shall have any action on this subject at the present session of Congress. I therefore submit to the chairman of the committee, as also to the Senator from Connecticut who moved this reference, that it would be better to have an expression of the Senate before the bill shall be recommitted.

Mr. President, having said thus much upon the question before the Senate, the motion to recommit, I claim indulgence for a very few moments while I refer to another matter. It seems that I am most unfortunate in the motions that I make touching bills that are before the Senate or that I have any connection with, either as having reported them or as a member of the committee. I remember that when the bill to repeal the law touching salaries was before the Senate, I accepted and voted for an amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON,] and at once it was said by almost every one in favor of the bill that it would certainly defeat it. I acted in that case, as I do upon most propositions, from a conviction that it was right and that it would tend to bring about the result that I desired. I shall not refer to the result in that case, nor to how near the bill that was finally passed agreed with the bill that I then accepted. Last week when the question was before the Senate upon the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] and when he withdraw his proposition to increase the amount to be redistributed to $75,000,000 and proposed an absolute increase of national-bank currency of $46,000,000, I, deeming it but proper and right for the purpose of perfecting the bill before the Senate, moved to strike out "$25,000,000" and insert "$50,000,000." Instantly my friend from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] my friend from Michigan on my right, [Mr. FERRY,] and my friend over the way, the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] appealed to me to withdraw that amendment for the reason that it would certainly defeat the effort the friends of an increase of the currency had in view, and I was told in rather plain terms that I was hardly true to the position I had occupied in the first part of the session; that I had announced myself in favor of an increase of the currency, and that now by my action I was distracting and dividing those who were in favor of that proposition, and that unless I withdrew my amendment it would certainly end in the defeat of what they wanted. I confess that such was the zeal and earnestness of my friends on either side of me and the appeals that they made to me that I was led to doubt the correctness of my position. I confess that, not looking at my friend on my right [Mr. FERRY] for awhile, I absolutely thought that he felt unkind and that he was not in the best humor in the world. I however looked at him after awhile, and I found that there was nothing in the world the matter with him, that he was only earnest. He had that earnestness which every man must have to be truly eloquent. If it be true, as was said of the great Chalmers, that the secret of his eloquence was earnestness, real, genuine blood earnestness, my friend from Michigan is the most eloquent man on this floor, for he certainly is the most earnest man on this subject I have found yet, unless it be my good friend the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] I like such earnestness. I am always glad to see it; and I know of no persons on this floor who give better exhibition of it than they do. I know it springs from the conviction that they are right; and having the strong conviction in their own minds that they are right, they can hardly conceive that those who differ with them in the course that should be taken can, by possibility, be right.

And yet, sir, let us see where we were then. I proposed to amend that bill by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "fifty." I then pointed out the objections there were to the substitute proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. I thought I saw then what the Senator from North Carolina admitted almost the next morning by the introduction of another substitute, withdrawing the one he had proposed, that it had been prepared hastily, was crude in its form, and that upon reflection and examination he would see that it were better to amend it or to substitute something else for it. The next morning he did accordingly introduce a substitute, withdrawing the one he had offered the day before, conforming in many respects to the suggestions I had made; and instantly my friends who felt that it was incumbent upon us to stand by the first proposition and do nothing at all that would seem to antagonize it, favored the proposition in this new form.

That was not all. Notwithstanding the appeal to us to stand by the forty-six millions as first introduced, in the crude form I have already stated, and though that was abandoned the next morning and another substitute offered, instantly they stood by that, and insisted that we should stand by that also; but yesterday, when the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] proposed as a substitute for that proposition free banking, we were appealed to at once to stand by that and abandon not only the first substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina, but the second one also, and it is insisted that every person who does not stand by the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania is tending to distract and divide the friends of an increase of the currency.

Mr. President, the question as it is now presented, aside from some amendments that I think would have to be made to it, is precisely in accord with the position that I took the first day that I spoke in the Senate on this subject. I said that I was in favor of increasing the greenback currency; and that is where I stand to-day. I said, however, if we are to have an increase of national banks let those banks be free, so that every person in the land having the requisite capital can engage in banking upon the same terms that any other person can. I say that is what I maintained if we were to have banks at all. I maintain that to-day. But I was opposed, as I then stated, to an increase of national-bank currency, to the amount of forty-six millions, or any other limited amount, and I proceeded to state very briefly the reasons that influenced me against any increase of a limited amount. I can only repeat what I said then, that I am satisfied that the people of this country are opposed in principle to national banks at all. I am satisfied that if we are to have national banks we should have free banking, and that they are opposed to any provision that shall look to the increase of these banks to an amount limited, for they do believe that these institutions are monopolies in their character, and are in the hands of a few, whereas they should be in the hands of all persons who have the capital and desire to engage in banking.

I said, however, that if there was to be an increase of the currency at all, I was in favor of an increase of greenbacks. I stand there today. If I vote for the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, with proper restrictions and amendments, I shall do so under protest, and from a conviction that I shall not be able to get an increase of greenbacks, and that if there is to be an increase of circulation it is only to be derived through the free-banking system; for I say here to-day that, in my judgment, the Government should be divorced from banks. It should take no further step in the direction of organizing banks for the issue of paper. My judgment is that the people demand that this shall be done, and that nothing in the coming years will tend so much to bring reproach upon Congress as the fact that the Government maintains its connection with these banks, and that Congress, from year to year, legislates upon these subjects. Do you ask me why? I will give you one reason. It is known throughout the country—and I do not mention it to the discredit or the disparagement of members of Congress, but I state the fact—that a large number in this body, as also in the House of Representatives, are interested in national banks. It is probably true that they will be interested in national banks in the coming years, whether we provide for an increase to a limited amount, or for free banking; but, sir, I tell you, and I now give this note of warning, that, in my judgment, in the coming years no one thing will be brought up so much as a reproach to the action of Congress as the fact that we organize banks, that members of Congress become members of such banks, and have to legislate upon the subject from year to year. You may say that these men are honest, and will not be influenced in their action by reason of such connection; but the fact remains that they do legislate upon the subject; the people know it; and it is utterly impossible that you can remove from the minds of the people the impression that they will be influenced by their interest in such institutions. Therefore, in my judgment, Congress should take no further step in the direction of the organization of national banks. I think that steps should be taken at as early a day as possible consistent with good faith to these banks, and the interest of those who have capital there invested, to withdraw such circulation and divorce the Government and Congress entirely from all connection with them.

I have said that I was in favor, if there was an increase, of having that increase in greenbacks. I am in favor of such increase. I was in favor of it when I came here. I stand there yet. The people that I have the honor in part to represent, I know, are in favor of such increase, were in December, and are yet. I am in favor of such increase in the way of greenbacks, because the people of this country are better satisfied with that currency than any currency they have ever had.

Mr. President, I have already said more than I intended when I rose. A few more words, and I have done. I have proposed that there shall be a redistribution of $50,000,000, instead of $25,000,000 as provided by the law of 1870, and as provided by the bill reported by the committee. It occurred to me, as I stated at the time I offered the amendment, that it would be a fair and just compromise between the different sections of the country; that our friends in the East would resist any proposition to redistribute the entire excess that they had of banking circulation, and that we in the West and South felt that $25,000,000 was not quite just to us in view of the increase of wealth and population in those portions of the country. I therefore suggested $50,000,000 as a fair compromise. I can see that our friends from the East very reasonably, and perhaps justly, insist upon holding on to this circulation. I have no doubt that we should do the same thing if the balance was in our favor; and I do not expect the Senators from the East to willingly yield this redistribution; but I submit to them whether it is not better, everything considered, that they should give up this without a struggle, or at least not resist it, and thus yield what seems to me but just and fair to the other portions of the country. It occurred to me that if we could thus amend the bill, we might be able to pass it, and get this question from before the Senate. I think it may possibly be done yet. But, whether this amendment shall be adopted or not, I desire to say that I shall vote against the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina for the increase of the bank currency by the amount of $46,000,000, and if required to vote upon the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I shall vote for free banking with all the safeguards, and all the restrictions, and all the limitations that may be necessary to make it entirely safe for the people.

With reference to such banks, I want to add one thing more. We cannot forget the fact that these banks do sometimes fail, either by reason of the mismanagement of those controlling them, the corruption of officers, or their dishonesty, or their frauds. Then, though it may be true that the bill-holder is protected by reason of the guarantee of the Government, it is nevertheless true that depositors often lose, and lose very largely, because of such dishonesty and such fraud. One, two, or three, failures of that kind throughout the year tend more to bring such banks into reproach, tend more to bring reproach upon the Government, tend more to bring reproach upon Congress, than almost anything that could occur in connection with our finances. The Government guarantees this circulation. The people everywhere feel, whether they are justified in so concluding I do not stop now to inquire, that the Government stands responsible to them, not only for the circulation, but for the deposits. It is not true in fact, and yet they do have a feeling that the Government should be thus responsible, and when they thus lose by reason of the default of the officers of these banks, they charge the default, they charge the fraud, they charge the dishonesty, upon the law and upon the Government. I think the Government should not place itself in a position to be thus charged and to be thus reproached from year to year. If, however, you give them a currency that is guaranteed by the nation, and that they know full well is good under all circumstances, they will be satisfied with it.

It has been said here that I am opposed to specie payments. Nothing could be more untrue. I am in favor of specie payments when trade and commerce shall bring us to that point, but I am opposed to specie payments by any forced law.

Why, Mr. President, look over the history of this nation; see what has taken place in the financial world upon this subject. I undertake to say here to-day, and to put it upon record, that though we have had laws in the States and in the nation providing for the redemption of bank currency, providing for the payment of gold, what has been the fact? When you could receive your gold readily, when business was prosperous, when there was no question at all with reference to the solvency of banks, but they were paying over their counters readily, no man cared anything about gold, no man cared whether he got gold for his bills or not; but let there come the least revulsion; let there come the least thing to disturb trade or commerce, and instantly the banks closed, and you did not get any gold; and there never has been a time in the history of this nation when you wanted gold more than at all other times that you got gold. It never has occurred, and it never will occur. If the laws of trade and the trade of the country do not justify the paying out of gold by the banks and those that have it, you never get the gold, and the time of all others that you want it is the time that you do not get it. I therefore say that if by law you provide for a return to specie payment, you may, by possibility, force it so far as the Government is concerned; but you just as inevitably bring contraction; you just as inevitably stop the wheels of trade, stop all the industries of the country, and bring a crisis upon us, beside which that of the last few months is a mere nothing.

Mr. President, I was surprised yesterday, when talking upon this subject, and with reference to getting gold here to carry out the resolve, to hear the language of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.] There is contained in his speech a most significant admission. I will read what he said:

> Mr. President, those are two measures we should adopt—reasonable retrenchment and necessary taxation; and the third measure is this: We should do just what we have pledged our faith we would do, "make provision"—that is the language of the pledge—to have the United States notes convertible into coin. This we should do by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time to accumulate gold. I heard what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] said on that subject, and I do not agree with him—I believe it entirely feasible to accumulate gold. It is true Great Britain preferred that the $15,500,000, the amount of the Geneva award, should not be paid here in gold and preferred keeping it; but if we were taking measures to resume specie payments in this country, there is enough of statesmanship in that nation, and enough of appreciation of their own interests, to induce them to afford every facility to aid us to accomplish that purpose. They would interpose no obstacle to our effecting a loan of gold. They know that the difference between gold or convertible notes and irredeemable paper has at some time been an almost prohibitory tariff and an obstruction to their importations here. They know that during the war, when gold was 200, manufactories were established all over the country; that it operated as to many of their manufactures as a prohibition; that to a degree gold, being worth more than our currency, still has that effect. And they would be ready to aid us in obtaining a loan that would enable us to commence specie payments.

And thereby stop the encouragement of manufactories. That is the fair, legitimate result of the proposition stated. In other words, come to a gold basis, do it by forced legislation, do it by accumulating gold in the Treasury of the nation, and you thereby will have the encouragement of England; they will give us their gold to bring about this desired result, that thereby they may encourage their own manufactories and discourage ours. If that is the proposition, then I say, in all candor, that is another reason why I am not in favor of this forced contraction and this forced resumption.

Mr. President, it seems to me if we unite upon the proposition for a redistribution of $50,000,000 of the bank currency, our friends from the East cannot reasonably object to it; and I think it would accomplish a great good in the direction we all desire so far as the South and West are concerned. I agree with the Senator from New Jersey that this is a question that should not be determined upon local considerations nor by mere personal feeling. Sir, there is something higher and nobler and truer in all public action than a mere personal triumph. It is higher and better for all men to stand by what they believe to be right, and to bottom their action upon what they believe to be principle. We may build in this case, as in all others, with granite ever so high, and yet, in the language of the greatest of American orators, Mr. Phillips, though we may thus build, the pulse of the weakest girl could beat it down. I say there is something higher and nobler and truer than a mere personal triumph. It is not a question whether my good friend, the Senater from Illinois, shall have this matter disposed of in the way he deems best, and thereby feel that he has accomplished something that is personal to himself, nor that I should have it result in the same way; but that we shall compare views, look to the best interests of all portions of this grand and growing country, and settle this question upon such principle and such a basis that all shall feel that it is for the best interests of all portions of the nation as far as possible. It is true that no man can expect that his own individual views shall be carried out to the exclusion of all others, nor should we stop or hesitate to do as nearly right as we can because we are unable to accomplish all that we believe to be right in the direction desired; but comparing views, looking to all portions of the nation, we should settle the question now before the Senate in such a way as that we shall feel it is permanent; and in such a way also as that all portions of the country shall be satisfied.

When we have done that, my good friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]—his coming into his seat now reminds me of it—can proceed in the direction that he seemed to think was necessary, or at least if not necessary, agreeable to his constituents in the production of maple sugar and pretty girls. My good friend suggested the other day that until Vermont shall cease making more maple sugar and producing more pretty girls than any other State, they could not expect to escape reproach in the Senate. If my good friend had not come into his place just at this moment, I perhaps would not have thought of it. If he will pardon me, I make this suggestion to him: I remember that some years since, in one of the States, a gentleman of my own name was a candidate for re-election to the office of governor. He was visited one day by a number of friends, and, while at table, one of them from the good county of Morgan, where my friend remembers the ague was probably born and grew to its full shaking power, suggested to him, "Governor, you are going to get all the votes in our county." The governor replied that he was very glad to hear it; he was very happy to know that his administration was so acceptable to the people that all persons were going to vote for him. Said his friend, "Governor, it does not make any difference about the administration." "Then," replied the governor, "I am very happy to know that whigs and democrats are all going to vote for me." His friend rejoined, "It does not make much difference about the whigs or the democrats; you just keep right on making Wright's Indian vegetable pills, that cure the ague every time, and you will get all our votes." [Laughter.]

My good friend from Vermont cannot do anything better, in my judgment, than proceed right on in the direction he indicates. I am sure there is no feeling so far as we are concerned; I am sure there is no feeling anywhere on this subject; I am sure the desire on the part of all here is to reach a proper and just result. I believe that we can do it if we continue this discussion; and when we shall have taken the sense of the Senate upon the questions now before us, I shall vote for a motion to recommit this bill, unless in my judgment its details are so perfected by the action of the Senate that a recommittal is unnecessary. I am sure, however, when we reach that point, no one will reasonably object, having had an expression of the Senate, to such recommittal, if they believe it is in the line that will tend to the perfection of the bill and get before the Senate what we all desire.

Mr. LOGAN. I was very sorry to hear the Senator from Iowa allude to this matter as a personal triumph, and intimate that I felt as though it would be a personal triumph to have it acted upon in a certain way. This is a very astonishing character of insinuation. What personal triumph could there be in having this matter disposed of either one way or the other, so far as I am concerned? I have not offered a solitary proposition on the subject. Certainly it could be no triumph to me. I am not seeking any personal triumphs on this or any other question. I have discussed it according to my theory; according to my ability, however poor that may be; according to my way of discussing questions. It may not be of the same character, or the same mode and manner, as that of my friend from Iowa.

One word further. The Senator from Iowa intimates that certain gentlemen here have changed their position. I think that remark was entirely uncalled for and unnecessary, especially so far as it applied to myself. In the first speech that I made on this subject in the Senate Chamber some time ago, I insisted on an increase of the currency by $50,000,000; but in the very same remark I added, "looking ultimately to free banking," showing that that was a favorite measure with me. That will be found in the first remarks I made in the Senate on the subject. I did favor the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, thinking that if we could not get anything else I would take that. I do favor the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, it coming up first, because it is more desirable than the other; but if that fails I shall vote for the other, intending to get the best thing possible for the country in the view that I have of the subject.

I do not wish to discuss this motion to recommit at all. I attempted to do that last night. I only wish to say to my friend from Iowa, that in speaking of changes that have been made on these propositions, and especially because he offered a motion, his remarks were a little stronger perhaps than he intended to make them. I did not criticise the motion that he offered. I said I was sorry it was offered at the time; but so far as the right to offer it is concerned, he certainly had that right.

As to his insinuation with reference to the Senator from Michigan and myself, as much as to say to the Senate, "Here is a young gentleman on my right, and here is a young gentleman on my left, who are proceeding in this discussion in a way that is not very pleasant; perhaps they are urging their views a little too strongly," I have nothing to say except this: I shall never attempt to create prejudice against men because they attempt to discuss measures in their way of discussing them. I shall never attempt to produce that kind of prejudice here in the Senate or elsewhere, because I understand this body to be one in which every member has the same right that any other member has to discuss questions in a proper manner, so that he keeps within the rules. As to whether the Senator from Michigan on the right, and the Senator from Illinois on the left, have participated to some extent in this discussion or not, that is what they have a right to do, the same as any other Senators. If their views are not correct, no one need adopt them. I am sure that this is no question coming from me, nor is it a proposition of the Senator from Michigan; but different propositions pertaining to the issue now before the Senate have come before us for us to discuss and to decide upon. I said yesterday evening that I was ready to vote. I say so now. The proposition is satisfactory to me. I thought I had a right to say that.

I merely wished to say this much to place myself right in reference to these propositions, because the Senator insinuated that changes had been made upon them that I cannot see or understand. I merely desire to say to him that I have changed no position that I have occupied from the beginning, but I shall vote for every measure which tends to do that which I think ought to be done by the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I am very much surprised indeed that my friend from Illinois should have the impression that I had insinuated that he had done anything that was the least improper and that he had not a perfect right to do. This is the first time I have ever risen in my place here to say a word with reference to a matter personal. I think it will be found that when I have anything to say with reference to any Senator here I will not leave it to mere insinuation. So far as my good friend is concerned, of course he had a perfect right to take any course he pleased with reference to this question. I did not intimate that he had pursued other than a straightforward course in reference to this question. I never intimated that he was seeking a personal triumph. Such a thing never entered my mind, and I am truly surprised that he should get such an impression.

I have but one word more to say. He says that I referred to my young friend on my right and my young friend on my left. I beg my good friend not to have the impression that I estimated myself so much older than either of them. It would be a question of very great doubt in my mind as to whether either of them had the advantage of me in that respect. I therefore shall not allow them to claim anything in the way of age.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not often refer to the Constitution of the United States, for I am not a constitutional lawyer; and yet I read that "Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof;" and this leads me to a very different conclusion from that at which the Senator from Iowa has arrived in regard to the power of Congress over money. It does seem to me that it puts the whole power of regulating not only coin, but anything which is to pass current as money, in the control of Congress; and it does appear to me that the establishment of banks by the different States is a violation of the implied power of Congress in that clause to which I have referred; for I do not see how it is possible for Congress to regulate money if it is to be under the control of thirty-seven States, each State differing in the exercise of its power in order to control the currency.

With that view I believe that it was one of the wisest things which Congress has ever done to adopt measures to organize a system of banking under national authority, which blotted out of existence the banks of the States; and with that view I hope that Congress will maintain and exercise this power in such a manner that the currency shall remain as it now is, of equal value in all sections of the country, an object which cannot be obtained under State banks. How this shall be done and how we shall manage in reference to this bill and the different propositions which are before us it is difficult for me to determine. I certainly am in favor of a bill which shall grant equal privileges in banking in all parts of the country, and I would have equal restraints upon banking and banks located in every section of the country. I would have New England and the North restrained in the same manner and having the same liberty that I would give to banks in any other section of the country. I think it is one of the most unwise, unsatisfactory, and I might say unjust, provisions made by law to undertake to parcel out the distribution of currency to different sections, based upon any basis which we can calculate; and therefore I am in favor at the earliest moment possible of removing all those restrictions and giving liberty. But I should like to see a bill which shall contain both the freedom and the restraints, so that we can see at one single view precisely the system which we are to have; and it is in this view that I moved to recommit the present bill to the Committee on Finance; but I do not know that they will bring forward such a bill as I prefer.

I should hesitate about voting for the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] unless it should contain in it some restriction, some limitation, something which will make it safe for a bank to give a note, a promise to pay, and something which will hold it to its obligations. Free banking, without restraint, is a promise to pay, but a promise which is never fulfilled. The legal-tender notes are promises to pay, but they are promises which have not been redeemed. I agree to the intimation of the Senator from Iowa that it might be very unwise to legislate so as to force the business of the country or the banks of the country into such a position as to compel them to meet all their obligations in specie at any particular time. I do not believe it is now practicable, if possible; but I do not believe there is another measure which is practicable and within the power of the Government. If you will make free banking and require the banks, as they are required now by law, to redeem in legal-tender notes, that may be very well if you will go a little further, and require the Government of the United States to redeem those legal-tender notes.

Now, the question is, is that possible or is it impossible? I think it is to-day impossible, or, if it could be done to-day, it would be impossible to-morrow; and therefore I am not ready either to say that the Government of the United States shall redeem its pledges in coin to-day or to-morrow; nor am I ready to say that it shall accumulate all the coin which it can place its hands upon and gather it into the public Treasury until it shall have such a proportion as to justify the resumption of specie payments.

But there is another way, which I have suggested before, which I think we can adopt, and if the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania will incorporate it in his bill, I will go for it with all my heart; and that is in connection with that bill to require of the Government to redeem on demand its legal-tender notes, either in coin or in interest-bearing bonds which may be easily converted into coin. Do that, and I am with the honorable Senator in the vote, often and every time.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I offer this amendment to the instructions proposed to be given to the committee in the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina. I offer as an amendment to his amendment:

And providing for the redemption of the whole national-bank currency in specie or the interest-bearing bonds of the United States.

Mr. President, when the Senator from Connecticut made his motion yesterday to refer this bill back to the Committee on Finance, I ventured to express my belief that that was the best thing the Senate could do. Never having been accustomed to accomplish any purpose that I desired by indirect means, and never desiring to dodge any question which it was my duty to meet, I did not suppose for one moment that any Senator would attribute either to any member of the Committee on Finance who favored that reference or to the whole committee anything savoring of artifice for the purpose of getting this measure away from the Senate. I thought the experience of the Senate had been such as to satisfy all that we could get no definite action upon any bill proposing to treat simply one phase of the financial question; and I think I may again with safety appeal to the experience of the Senate to verify that remark. What has been that experience?

I may not be correct in the order of time in which they were introduced; but we had first a resolution from the Committee on Finance, and debate went on ad libitum upon that. The resumption of specie payments, the question of reserves, of interest upon deposits, of rates of interest, everything connected with banking and finance was discussed upon it. Then came the bill simply to authorize national banks to deposit legal-tender notes instead of their own circulation, and withdraw bonds to an equivalent amount—a bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] Again came the bill to authorize the establishment of banks of deposit, without circulation. The bill of the Senator from Indiana came up, and again was opened up the whole discussion. We had homilies upon the amount of the circulation of France and of England, upon how notes were issued upon exchequer bills and coin in England. We had everything connected with the subject of finance on the simple proposition coming from the State of Indiana to permit a bank that had more capital than it wanted to get rid of $10,000 of it at a time. So when the bill came up for establishing banks of deposit, without circulation, the whole subject was entered upon again; and then when this bill is considered, simply to enforce the provisions of the existing law, we are out upon the whole sea of speculation and theories of finance again. After all this, when the Senator from Connecticut, without consultation, so far as I am aware, with anybody, certainly without any conference with the Committee on Finance—or if there was a conference, I as a member was left out—made his motion to refer this subject back to the committee, the Senator from Illinois talks about "dodging" and "management" to get the bill out of the Senate.

It was not because I am unwilling to meet any of these questions that I favored the reference. I think I am ready to meet any of them. But I think it is perfectly apparent to the Senate that we would run the risk of an ill-considered measure, if upon this bill, proposing only to accomplish one purpose, we venture to act upon amendments offered in the Senate without having had full time to consider them, and without having had them subjected to the examination of a committee. Certainly the members of the Committee on Finance never claimed that their action should bind the Senate, much less that it should bind the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] who we all know acts upon every question so independently, so entirely devoid of all idea of dodging or evading any question, that it matters not from what committee a measure comes, his judgment alone will settle for him how he shall act upon it.

When the Senator from Connecticut made the motion to refer, I thought, and I still think—and in this I may differ from my colleagues on the committee—that the best mode of disposing of this question is to refer it back. If we are to have instructions by the votes here, very well; I shall be glad of them; but if we take the instruction upon this question as it is now before us, what does it amount to? It amounts to an instruction to increase the national-bank circulation to an amount not exceeding $400,000,000. Even if the amendment which I offer to it is adopted, it simply provides for the redemption of the national-bank circulation in gold, or in legal-tender notes. But what else are we to do? How are we to dispose of the question which affects these national banks largely, one which has received perhaps as much attention in the country as any other, the question of whether they are to pay or receive interest on their deposits? How about the question of taxation, whether they are to continue paying their taxes to the States? And how about the question of taxation upon the deposits of private banks? Here is a question upon which the Senate has not even power to originate a measure, and which may be necessary if these questions of taxation or interest upon deposits are to be considered at all. How are you to dispose of the question of reserve? How are you to dispose of the question of the rates of interest which they are to be permitted to take? How are you to dispose of the many questions which will inevitably be presented, each Senator bringing forward those which suggest themselves to his mind upon this bill?

I am, as I have already said, not at all unwilling to meet these propositions. Without seeming to be presumptuous, I think I am ready to meet and vote, so far as I have light on the subject at present, upon every one of these questions. I cannot vote at present for the amendment offered by my colleague for free national banking without any limitation and without any provision for redemption. I have no hesitation in saying that I am in favor of free banking. I am in favor of free banking, the Government furnishing legal-tender notes through the banks, and the banks being primarily responsible for their redemption in gold or United States bonds, and the Government ultimately responsible; but I am not in favor of doubling the number of national banks upon their present organization. I would be willing to see every legal-tender note now issued bearing a different impress. I am willing to see them all returned and redeemed either in coin or the bonds of the United States, and others issued in their place, acknowledging the truth upon their face. That truth is that neither this Government nor any other government, nor any bank on the face of the earth, can carry on the business which civilization demands with a paper currency and be ready at all times to redeem the whole amount of that paper currency in gold; and therefore those notes should be reissued acknowledging the truth which everybody has acknowledged, that we will pay them in specie when we can, and when we cannot we will redeem them with our bonds bearing interest.

I think, Mr. President, this discussion has elicited that there is a very general concurrence in three truths. I at least think I have gathered that many from this discussion. One is that everybody is in favor of specie payments at some time; the second is that nobody can tell when we shall be able to resume; and the third is that when we do resume, and a panic comes, we cannot continue to redeem in specie. I do not know I have heard anybody question these.

I must, perhaps, add another, although not so plainly announced as these three, and that is that we cannot legislate so as effectually to prevent panic. Panics are just as inseparable from a credit system as floods are from a country that has rains. Panic will come wherever credit is used, and the extent of the panic depends entirely upon the extent of the debt. When a mechanic fails, his creditors in his neighborhood go to his shop and want their money; if they cannot get the money they want security; and if they cannot get security they are willing to take his commodities; and if they cannot get any of them, he is a bankrupt. The extent to which the credit goes measures the extent of the panic. If a manufacturer or merchant fails, it is a little larger than when the mechanic fails. If a bank fails, it is a little larger than when a manufacturer fails; and if a great banking institution known throughout the country and throughout the world fails, it disturbs confidence in all banks, and you have a panic that will last until men get back to sober reflection and see whether there was any occasion for the panic or not.

That is what we have had; and here, I suppose, upon this one bill to carry out what was recognized to be justice in the law of 1870, to remove an obstacle in carrying that law out, we are to meet all the remedies that are to be prescribed for panics, upon amendments suggested on the spur of the moment in the Senate, instead of having a well-considered measure in the light of all the discussion we have had.

Now, sir, my purpose was, and I am free to avow it, to economize time, to get these questions all into one bill, and then have one discussion and an end to the whole subject, instead of repeating the same discussion over five or six different bills presenting different aspects of the question, and perhaps failing to agree upon any of them.

I may be mistaken in that; I may desire to accomplish results instead of making speeches; but if so I have to blame my practical nature for it. I do desire to see a result; others may prefer the speeches without practical results. I do desire to see the Senate meet all these questions and try whether they can agree upon any system; and I shall vote, notwithstanding the criticisms of my friend from Illinois, to refer this bill back to the Finance Committee, and we will endeavor to work in the light which this discussion has shed upon it. If we can have instructions, so much the better; but if we are to have them, and we are to have any practical measure on this subject before the end of the session, I trust they will come soon, so that we shall be able to go to work and report in time to have action upon the report.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, I have but a few words to say upon this question of reference. I withheld saying anything yesterday, nor did I design saying a word at this time until I found that almost all of the members of the Finance Committee have expressed their views and disclosed the fact that those views differ not at all from what they were when expressed in committee. I think I am not trespassing upon the rules of the Senate when I say this much, inasmuch as the bill before us, which it is now proposed to recommit to the committee, came from that committee following a resolution asking the judgment of the Senate upon the question of finance.

When the motion was made to recommit, it struck my mind as a little disrespectful to the request of the committee. I am well aware there was no such intention in the mover of this motion, and if I had any such thought it would be dismissed this morning since hearing what has been said by the Senator from Connecticut. And yet I find that this bill was reported by the chairman of the committee after a resolution had appeared here at the instance of that committee, reported by the chairman, inviting precisely the question that is now at issue before the Senate, simply the judgment of the Senate upon the question whether its policy shall be to increase or contract the currency. Now, sir, I confine myself strictly to the question at issue in the point of reference, and that involves the whole subject, in my judgment.

The Senator from Pennsylvania who has just taken his seat, [Mr. SCOTT,] referring to this bill that appeared in the Senate, the design of which was simply to enforce a statute now practically a nullity, stated that it was simply that and nothing more; and yet we find it here with amendments attached for which the committee is not now responsible. The bill was spread before the Senate, and I, at least, am not responsible for what the net has drawn. But the Senator cannot shut his eyes to the fact that upon it and with its reference goes the question whether this committee shall report for an increase or a contraction of the currency.

I have listened very carefully to the discussion upon this question, and, so far as disclosed by the members of the Finance Committee, I find that they repeat precisely the position that they took in committee. I have not changed my view. The Senator on my left, [Mr. WRIGHT,] as he has expressed himself this morning, has not changed his view. Therefore I cannot see any profit, any gain by the recommittal of this bill to the committee, for the committee must of necessity report back precisely the judgment of the majority of its members, and it was because of that, the committee finding itself in the dilemma of disagreement, that it invited the judgment of the Senate before proceeding further on this great question. Now, sir, it is proposed, after the lapse of weeks in discussion on this very question, to remand it back to the committee, and before the instructions offered by the Senator from North Carolina were presented, proposed to remand it back simply for the action of the committee without a judgment of the Senate.

Mr. President, if there had been any test vote in the Senate I should have been perfectly willing to accord with this motion to recommit this bill, but until the present moment no vote has been taken, and with the exception of the speeches that have been made by but a minority of the Senate on this question, we are in the dark so far as the judgment of the body is concerned, though I should be very willing to support this motion if we could economize time by it. I cannot see how it is possible to derive any practical benefit from recommitting this bill without the instructions of the Senate. True, it appeared here for a single object, but it now stands with the great question attached, and you cannot dismiss it, and the Senate is confronted with it; and now it is proposed to send it back either to sleep in the committee or to return with substantially the same ideas.

I wish to say in this connection that I have changed my judgment upon one point, and based, too, on this very bill; and to that extent I thank its appearance here that it has corrected my judgment upon a question and will lead me to vote directly opposite to what I intended. When this bill was reported originally it was my intention to vote in favor of it; but when I heard from the lips of the present occupant of the chair [Mr. ANTHONY] the protest of a portion of his State against the withdrawal of twenty-five millions of currency from New England, Rhode Island protesting against the withdrawal of its portion, I, in that respect, changed my judgment, and I have based it upon this admission of Rhode Island that she has not currency enough. If that be so, what right, what practical right, have you to demand that Rhode Island and New England shall surrender what they have enjoyed and what they need? That lays the foundation for the whole question in my mind, and has led me to the very issue presented by the Senator from North Carolina, that if Rhode Island and New England have not currency enough, then the West and South have not enough; and I am ready to vote for the increase of forty-six millions precisely upon the basis and upon the fact disclosed by the action of the Senator from Rhode Island.

That is all the change that has passed through my mind upon this bill and the resolution reported by the committee; and I rose to state it as a member of the Finance Committee, that I might not be misapprehended, and that the Senate might not misapprehend its action, so far as I am concerned. I cannot see how it is possible to gain any more intelligent view than we now possess by sending it back to the committee. True, by the action of a committee you may formulate some plan and perhaps save some moments; but when it comes to the issue of whether this branch of Congress is ready to increase or decrease the currency, your committee is blockaded in itself, and there is no denial of it. If I doubted it, it is admitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] who has offered an amendment to the instructions based upon specie resumption.

I ask, therefore, what is the use of recommittal if we desire to meet this issue as is stated, and I am frank to say I am ready to meet it, as ready as the Senator from Pennsylvania or the Senator from Illinois; but we cannot shut our eyes, neither will the country release us from the responsibility of deciding now whether we shall adopt a policy of expansion or contraction; and that is the issue that was before the committee and is now before the Senate. Therefore I say that practically the effect of the reference, without any such intention of the movers or supporters, is to waive the question before the Senate, and let it be considered in the committee, by and by reviving the discussion, to occupy more weeks of the Senate. If I were to express my judgment, it would be that now, at the close of the discussion, when the questions are all fresh in the minds of Senators, we should pronounce the judgment of the Senate and inform the country whether we are for expansion or contraction. The country feels that this should be done. We get it in our mails and through all the sources of information; and yet the Senate halts upon a question of such gravity, and is unwilling, after a discussion of three or four weeks, to pronounce its judgment before the country. I am ready. If I speak earnestly on this matter, it is because it covers the very gist of the whole question. I am ready to put my vote on record on this vital issue, and I beg that it may be taken early. I have not interposed delay to any great extent; but I have, so far as I have felt it my duty, expressed in an humble manner my belief and my judgment of the question with that sense of duty. I express now, just before the vote is taken, the hope that we may undeceive ourselves, and my belief that if this bill goes to the committee we stand now as then.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this debate has gone so far that it seems to me it would be better to have some satisfactory result from it by a vote of the Senate on some of the leading propositions involved in the debate. When my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] yesterday, without consulting me certainly, or anybody but his own good judgment, proposed to refer this matter to the Committee on Finance, I was rather disposed to acquiesce in it; but a night's reflection has convinced me that on the whole it is better that we should have a vote of the Senate on some of these propositions.

The proposition now submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania on my right [Mr. SCOTT] presents for the first time in this whole debate a practical, distinct question, which must be settled first of all, as it seems to me. The proposition to settle our financial difficulties by free banking is an old one. I am decidedly in favor of it, and have always been in favor of repealing all the limitations upon banking privileges. But the idea of free banking without redemption, or free banking with the bank-notes redeemable in irredeemable paper money, is the wildest scheme of lunacy. It was twice enacted into history; once in the French revolution and once in our revolutionary war; and a third time, I may add, by the late so-called Confederate States. If you can unite the idea of free banking with some mode of redemption, make our notes practically par in gold, you will have solved the financial question. That is the only solution.

The only question, it has seemed to me from the beginning of this controversy, is as to the character of that redemption. First, as to whether any measures should be taken at all, I should have to differ with my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] I think the country is bound by honor, by public faith solemnly pledged, and the republican party is trebly bound by obligations of honor, three times repeated, to take some steps toward the redemption of the notes of the United States. Therefore I think we ought to do something, although I would far rather join with him in doing nothing than something which goes in the opposite direction.

It seems to me, then, that the question comes down to this: What plan of redemption can be adopted that will avoid the evils to the country of a sharp contraction of the currency and derangement of business affairs? I do not believe it is possible to maintain coin redemption in the country now. Why? Because ten years of irredeemable paper money have driven out of our country the great body of the gold that was in it; and to-day we have only $135,000,000 of gold in the United States of America, whereas before the war we had $300,000,000. I say, therefore, that any proposition like the proposition of my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] or that of my friend from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] looking to coin redemption, seems to me impracticable. We cannot draw to this country any large sum of gold without it so disturbing the money relations of other countries as to react upon ourselves and disturb our own. Therefore I dismiss it as a thing actually impossible.

But are we, then, without remedy? Is there no other mode? Why, Mr. President, the mode was suggested by the law of 1862. It is the simplest mode that could possibly be devised. It is the mode that every honest man in the world would resort to. If a man would not yield to it in his private life, he would be called dishonored and disgraced in every community of the world. That is, when his note is presented to him and he cannot pay it, at least he will give his obligation for it bearing interest and the best security practicable. That is now the position of the United States. The United States now stand with $380,000,000 of its notes outstanding which it has promised to pay, which it is pledged to pay in coin, but which it cannot pay; and now what objection can there be to giving for such a note to anybody who desires it the bond of the United States with interest to be paid promptly and annually? Is not that an obligation of honor? Is not that an obligation of good faith? Would not every good citizen be bound to do that?

But it is objected that this would contract the currency; this would produce great evils in the country and great distress. Let us see. If in connection with that proposition to redeem your currency you have another proposition which would allow anybody who holds your bonds to organize a bank under the same burden of redemption, it removes all difficulty; and the two propositions, taken together, will furnish a system of relief that it seems to me is perfectly feasible and perfectly easy. If your notes should flow into the Treasury, in exchange for bonds, they might be paid out again in the ordinary course of the operations of the Treasury Department; they might be used in the redemption of 6 per cent. bonds of the United States to the amount of $1,200,000,000. If this did not furnish sufficient currency for the business of the country, then the way is open to any man who holds bonds of the United States to file them in the Treasury and to start a bank in any part of the territory of the United States, without limitation or restriction.

The burden of redeeming bank-notes with greenbacks, themselves convertible into bonds, would always make the bank-notes and the greenbacks equal to bonds, which are now equal practically to gold. Sir, I never could answer this simple proposition: "Why should we give to capitalists the right to deposit their bonds and receive bank-notes secured by them, and yet refuse to give to the holder of the note they issue the right to demand the same bonds in case the notes are not paid?" Why should the bond be worth more than the note? Why should the capitalist be able to take his bonds and go and get notes of the United States for them? They are notes of the United States. A national-bank note is just as much a note of the United States as a greenback. The United States agrees to pay it; is bound to pay it; holds the security to pay it; it is really a note of the United States. These notes are issued in the interest of capital. Why should not these capitalists redeem these notes in the very securities that are deposited with the Government for their redemption? There is no difficulty in the way of it. One ought to be convertible into the other, promptly, quickly, surely.

Now, sir, I do not intend to discuss this question; I did not intend even thus far to enter into the argument of the question of redemption, but only to say that whenever free banking is proposed you must unavoidably connect with it some plan of redemption, and then the system is very free and very easy, and I can vote for it with the greatest pleasure. Two simple sections, one the section proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] and another a section which would authorize any holder of a greenback to apply to the Government of the United States and receive 5 per cent. bonds at his pleasure, will be enough; and then the whole thing is automatic; no secretary has discretion or power over the subject. Every holder of a note has a right to demand a bond, and every citizen of the United States may engage in banking. The whole system is free.

But, sir, I have said all I desire to say about that point, except as it bears on the order of business. Look at it. We have got three degrees removed from the bill that is now pending before us. The bill now pending before us is a bill simply to carry into execution the law of 1870, which has been recommended to us in the ordinary course, referred to the Committee on Finance, carefully prepared and reported here, with the expectation—it seems to have been a vain one—that it would pass without much objection. Every one saw that it was important to give to the Western States opportunities to organize banks when they had not their fair share of them already, and that the New England States—a few of them that had a great excess—might very well suffer the inconsiderable loss of a portion of their circulation in order to satisfy a just local demand. That seemed to be simply fair. We reported such a bill, and now what have we got?

First we have a proposition to defeat the act we report, because any of these amendments cuts off the head of our poor bill. One proposition of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] is to swell the volume of bank paper $46,000,000 without any restraint, but to just lift and swell to that extent the bank paper of the country. That raises the question of inflation, for no plan of redemption is proposed. That, it seems to me, entirely defeats the object of our bill and destroys it; and that comes from the southern section. This $25,000,000 bill was intended to give relief to the South. It was said that while the South were engaged in war they could not engage in the business of banking. Most of the applications that are now in existence for new banks are from the South or far West; and when we provided what we regarded as an easy, gradual, proper means of relief to the South and West, lo and behold, the southern Senators, almost to a man, say they do not want that; they will not take this relief which will satisfy their local demand unless we flood the country with more paper money. That is the position in which we are placed by them.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I prefer to be allowed to conclude what I have to say without interruption.

When we get over that, why if that amendment should be voted down, then the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] venerable in years and character, for whose opinion I always have respect, comes here and proposes—what? He says our bill is not sufficient, lay it aside, and then he proposes free banking. Well, what does that mean? That means the right of any capitalist, not to convert his bonds into money, but to hold on to his bonds, or rather to deposit them safely where they will be kept for his benefit, and where he will get his interest promptly, and upon that deposit to issue 90 per cent. of the amount in paper money. When is that paper money to be paid? The Lord knows when! There is no provision for its redemption. It is to be paid in greenbacks; but when are the greenbacks to be paid? No man will say. Every measure looking toward paying greenbacks has been voted down. Although the administration of General Grant commenced its official life with a solemn declaration that the greenbacks should be made as good as gold, yet no proposition has been passed by either House of Congress even looking to it; and now it is proposed, without making any provision for the payment of the greenbacks, to issue more bank paper in an unlimited amount. How much can be issued? There are $1,600,000,000 of bonds, so that between $1,400,000,000 and $1,500,000,000 can be issued in this form of paper money, with no restriction, no limitation.

It seems to me that this proposition of my honorable friend is too wild. If he was just entering upon the heyday of life, with the visions of hope spread out before him, and castles rising in the air buoyant with hope, he might indulge in these glorious visions of an unlimited amount of paper money. But it seems to me that for the Nestor of the Senate to proclaim this wild, illimitable issue of paper money is entirely too hopeful. Why, sir, if you adopt this step you array against the redemption of our promises the whole of the banking interest of the country, now already, I fear, too much arrayed against it. You never would see specie payments in my time or in yours, sir. It would burst up and leave behind ruin and misfortune, as all the irredeemable paper money schemes are very apt to do.

Now, Mr. President, if you will accompany the proposition of my friend from Pennsylvania with something that will hold it to the earth, something that will look to a promise of payment, then it is right enough. The trouble is, he has the balloon filled, but he has no ballast, no crib, no bucket, no basket to hold it to the earth, and the very moment he cuts the ropes it is gone. Now, sir, if he will add to it some provision to redeem the notes that he issues, some provision that will make the greenbacks as good as gold, or as near to it as the condition of our affairs will enable us to do—any scheme whatever, I do not care what it is, that will provide for the redemption of our broken promises—then I can vote with him with the greatest pleasure, as I always wish to do.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that it is better to strip this bill of all things that have been thrown around it, and then in due time, or right off if you please, take up the great question and pass some such bill as has been proposed for free banking and redemption. That probably will settle the financial question. But now we are three degrees removed. What shall we do? Yesterday with great reluctance I said I was disposed to vote to refer this to the Committee on Finance to get out of the drag we were then in; but now it is made worse and worse. My honorable friend from Connecticut has offered a motion to refer. My honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] says that is a dodge. The Senator from Connecticut is not a very good dodger. I am sure I am not accustomed to dodge, and am not disposed to do it now. I want a fair vote on all these propositions after Senators have had a chance to debate them. But that is not all. After the Senator from Connecticut had made this effort, then the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] comes back and wants to hitch on to this motion instructions that we shall report his particular idea. Then my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] not to be behindhand, wants to hitch on to them another series of instructions. So now the question before the Senate is, what instructions shall be given to the Committee on Finance as to what they shall do when they do report or after this matter is re-referred?

Mr. President, I again appeal to the Senate. Let us drop all these clogs that surround us, and go back to the bill that has been reported and that is now on our table. Let us pass that first as clearly right, clearly just, and then let us take up this great question, and see if we cannot agree on some plan for free banking that will also provide a plan of redemption that can be carried out with proper regard to the public policy and the public faith.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire only to say a word to my friend from Ohio. I believe he has changed years with me. Old men generally are suspicious; young men are hopeful. The Senator from Ohio, I think, is about a quarter of a century younger than I am; and yet he talks about my filling balloons. I have not attempted to make a balloon which I cannot bring to the earth. If I had any difficulty about it I would get drags, and I would compose the drags of old men like him, men who have no faith in their country, no faith in their fellows, and hardly any faith in themselves. I have entire faith in this great country of ours, and I have entire faith in the good people who populate this country.

I have not proposed a measure which never looks to specie payments, as the Senator seems to suppose. On the contrary, I propose a measure which I believe will bring specie payments earlier than any of the propositions produced by the Senator who is the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I believe that this Government in a few years, if you give the people time to work up to their necessities, will resume specie payments and continue them for long years under a proper banking system.

Why, Mr. President, the country would be ready now to resume specie payments if the greenbacks were out of the way, and I propose to take them out of the way by making them the basis of a banking currency which surely locks them up in the vaults of the banks. I shall have no objection, after this amendment of mine shall have been passed, that you shall make provision that the Government shall redeem its greenbacks in bonds in one, or two, or three years. I am not in favor of attempting to make the Government resume now. She cannot do so. It is impossible for the Government to resume now, and everybody who reflects on the subject must know that.

I have great respect for our Finance Committee. One that I consider among the ablest men on that committee is my colleague, [Mr. SCOTT,] and every one who knows him and knows me knows that there is no man in Pennsylvania for whom I have greater regard, or for whose judgment I have more respect; and yet that committee have had the subject before them for two or three months without arriving at any practical result. I am not willing to believe that if we send this bill back to them they will do much more work than they have done hitherto. I mean that as no disrespect to them; but I say it because I know human nature. Men having fixed ideas in their minds are very unwilling to take advice, or to take suggestions from anybody else. They will go back into their committee-room with their old notions, and they will try to get ideas and suggestions which will strengthen their old notions; and I fear if we send the question back to them, it will come to us again in a chaotic condition after awhile, and we shall have to go to work again and do what we have been doing now; and we shall have to waste as much time hereafter as we have already wasted on this subject.

This currency question is the great one of the day. Whether the proposition that I produce will bring great results or not, it will produce this: it will give confidence to the people in their representatives; it will satisfy them that we have some proposition looking to their benefit; and that is what we need now more than anything else.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the motion to refer these propositions back to the Committee on Finance is a seductive one; but I submit that there can now be no very good reasons for it. As has been just said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, the committee had this whole question before them for nearly three months and all that they have offered here is what my friend behind me [Mr. SHERMAN] calls this "little bill," to take twenty-five millions from New England and give it to the States in the South. He says it is simply to carry out the law of 1870. It is a new bill in every sense. The act of 1870 is a dead letter. The provision was inadequate four years ago; it is grossly inadequate now; and everybody knows it. My friend himself admits it is only a half-way measure. It is not that, even; it is less than a third-way; and now when the committee came forward to give us a bill, why did they not give us an adequate bill? Why come forward with a little piece of patch-work after three months' incubation during this session?

Mr. President, what excuse can there be for this act of spoliation upon New England except upon the principle that the currency shall not be increased at all—for disguise it as you will, it is in the nature of a spoliation? Can you take $25,000,000 from the loans and discounts of three or four States without producing disastrous results? My friend from Massachusetts, not now in his seat [Mr. BOUTWELL] showed us the other day very conclusively how a proposition to take fifteen millions of gold, the amount of the Geneva award, from England, a country plethoric with gold, threatened the financial equilibrium of England, and it was so adjusted by negotiation that the money was paid without a dollar of gold being brought to this country. He made that clear to us. We all understand how locking up ten or fifteen millions of currency in the city of New York will produce a panic in stocks that will affect the whole country; and I undertake to say that the withdrawal of twenty-five millions from the loans and discounts of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New York, will affect those States disastrously; and whatever my friends here may say about it, their people will not be content with it, and they will find it out. I have recently conferred with one of the most intelligent and one of the largest business men in Boston, who says, if it is supposed in the Senate that Massachusetts will consent to the withdrawal of $13,000,000 from the loans and discounts of Massachusetts, they are very much mistaken. No such consent will be given by the people.

I said it was in the nature of a spoliation, and so it is. It does not come entirely from the banks that were formed last, after Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island had got their share of the currency; but it comes as well from the banks that were first formed, and that got their currency legitimately. They have to contribute to this amount as well as the later banks.

Now, Mr. President, there are two sets of arguments used here, I believe, by my friend from Ohio. He told us the other day very emphatically that this redistribution of $25,000,000 would suffice for two years to come; that it would not be taken; and now we are told that free banking will all at once flood the country with increased paper money. We would not take $25,000,000 in two years if it was offered, and free banking will suddenly flood the country with $1,700,000,000. One argument or the other must be wrong. I submit that both are wrong. There is a common sense, and there is a fair medium in regard to this that ought to be considered, and not go to extremes upon either hand.

Why, Mr. President, it is contended here by the Senator from Rhode Island not now in his seat, it is contended by others, that New England has not a dollar more of circulation than she needs; that her business requires what she has got, and I believe it. Then if you withdraw $25,000,000 from New England, she will confessedly have $25,000,000 circulation less than she needs. If you give $25,000,000 to the South and West they will have that much more, but they will have very much less than they need. What kind of a bill is it that produces such results, that takes $25,000,000 from New England when she needs all she has, and her representatives contend for it on this floor, and gives that amount to the West and South, when it is far less than they need?

Am I not authorized and justified, therefore, in calling it a mere half-way measure, a mere piece of patchwork? As I said before, what excuse can be made for this act of spoliation, except upon the principle that there shall not be any increase of currency under any circumstances?

Mr. President, this is a generation of fault-finders. The "school for scandal" is the only system of common schools that now prevails throughout the States; and there is nothing that is worse slandered and vilified than the currency. According to the arguments made on this floor the very worst thing for this country is the currency. It is a wonder that there are any solvent men in the country, that we have made any progress whatever, when we consider what a villainous currency we have got. Who talks in this way about it? Is it the mass of the people of the United States? Not a bit of it. The great body of our people East and West are satisfied with this currency, and believe it is the best currency we have had; and while they expect to come back to specie payments at some time, and want to do it, they want to do it naturally; they believe that specie payment is the normal condition of the currency, when the country is in a normal condition; they believe that specie payment is the result of a condition of the country, rather than of any artificial process. You cannot make specie payment and retain it, unless the country is in a condition for it; and when the country is in a condition for it, specie payment will come without a resort to these artificial processes.

Now, Mr. President, how does the matter stand? Here is a bill to redistribute $25,000,000 of bank currency. My friend from Ohio has just said that that was intended for the Southern States. He confesses by that remark that the Northwestern States are to be left out in the cold entirely. Of thirty-seven States only eleven have got their full share of the apportionment. Of those eleven some five or six have a very large excess. There are twenty-six States that have less than their apportionment. The ratio of deficiency differs very greatly in those States. These $25,000,000 will be apportioned among those States having the greatest ratio of deficiency. The result is that ten or eleven States would not get one dollar out of this twenty-five millions; the entire Northwest would not be allowed anything under the apportionment. They are left standing out; they are to take the chances of future legislation. They are left standing in the pillory. Take my friend's own great State. There is no authority now to organize a national bank in Ohio. There is no authority to organize a State bank in Ohio. That State is bound hand and foot, growing fast as she is and developing every way. There is no capacity now to organize a State or national bank in Ohio. I do not believe her people are satisfied with that. If they are like the people of Indiana I know they are not satisfied with it. Certain classes of her people are, as they are in every State. The men whose fortunes consist in a fixed money capital are satisfied with it. They would like any legislation that would increase the value of their money. I expect men to act naturally. I expect them to be for what is their interest. A man that has $100,000 in greenbacks, if he can have that money made worth $110,000 by any artificial process in the course of one year, wants it done. The men of fixed capital do not want more money, nor do they want more banks. Why, sir, I never knew a village merchant who wanted another store on the opposite corner. I do not know of any town in my State where the banks want more banks in that town. Men are governed by their interests. I am speaking now for the mass of the people, and what I believe to be their interests, and what I believe to be their desire. Here is a bill of redistribution which makes no provision at all for any State in the Northwest, and leaves twelve States at least that are deficient—and States that are growing, too, more rapidly than any others in this Union—without the means of getting an additional dollar of banking circulation.

I appeal to my friend if that can be defended for one moment. I ask what justification can be offered for such a bill as that? If he undertakes to legislate for redistribution at all it should be full, it should be equitable. Here is a bill giving $25,000,000 to certain States, leaving other States unprovided for. Something may occur in future time by which they will get it, but they have to take the chances of it. Can you satisfy them with that? Will the State of Missouri be satisfied with a future chance? I undertake to say not. I have reason to believe that she will not. She has immediate demands, and they are growing, and as fast as they grow they ought to be answered and provided for in some way. You cannot take enough money from the States in excess and give it to the States in deficiency without producing a panic in the Eastern States. Fifty millions will not do it, let alone twenty-five millions. Fifty millions taken from New England would result in almost the total prostration of business in New England.

Mr. President, we are told that if we increase the national banking circulation we bring on speculation and we put specie payments further off. I do not believe one word of it. There is no logic in it. If you increase the number of national banks, do they not under the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] have to redeem in greenbacks? Are they not required to have a reserve of 15 per cent. for circulation and 15 per cent. for deposits, and, if the banks are in a large city, of 25 per cent. for each? You increase the demand for greenbacks; you do not increase the number of greenbacks, but you increase the demand for them. So far from increasing the premium on gold, I believe it will rather tend to bring it down. There is a great difference between increasing the national-bank circulation and increasing the volume of greenbacks; but my friend talks as if it was all the same thing. It is not the same thing. There is a radical difference. These banks have limitations. He said they were to be without limitations. They have limitations. What are they? That whenever a note is presented at their counter and a demand for legal-tenders is made, they are bound to give the legal-tenders, or, if not, that note can be protested and in the course of ten days the bank put into liquidation. They are required to redeem at their own counters, and they are required to have redeeming agencies elsewhere in one of the redeeming cities; and, what is more, if they fail to redeem, their bonds may be forfeited. There is a provision in the law that when a bank fails to redeem, the Treasury Department may forfeit the bonds at their par value. Although these bonds command a premium of twenty cents in the market, the Government has a right under the law to forfeit these bonds to the Government at their par value, thus inflicting upon the bank the penalty of the total loss of the premium on its bonds. That is the provision of the law now. The Government has the discretion. It may forfeit the bonds at their par value, or it may order the bonds to be sold. I believe, thus far, it has only ordered bonds to be sold in the market; but power has been reserved to the Government from the beginning of forfeiting the bonds at their par value whenever a bank fails to redeem its notes in greenbacks. As the Senator from Pennsylvania said, so far from being an obstacle in the way of resumption, I believe it will contribute to that result. It makes money plentier, and that is what the people want. I can only say for my State that while we have men who want no more banks and want no more currency, and some of them would like to see contraction of the currency, yet the great body of the people of my State want more currency, and I believe that is the general expression throughout the Northwest. Of course I shall be told they do not know what is good for them. They think they do. They think they know what they want.

What I desire to meet is the statement made here by the Senator from Ohio, that there is no limitation. There is the same limitation upon national banks in the future that there has been in the past, that they are required to redeem in greenbacks. My friend said that we might have the national-bank currency run up to $1,700,000,000. Why, sir, the whole of the greenbacks would be taken up in reserves long before you would get to $1,700,000,000. How can these banks procure the reserves? The difficulty becomes greater with every additional bank that is organized. Banks will not be organized except as they are profitable and as local needs require them. Here and there in Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, all around, they want banking facilities. They cannot get them now; they are bound hand and foot; and my friend seems determined that they shall remain in that condition.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana a question; I did not wish to interrupt him in the course of his remarks. He says the State of Ohio can have no increase of banking capital, national or State. Whose fault is it? Do the people of Indiana or the people of Rhode Island prevent the people of Ohio from having bank capital under State charters if they want it, or do the people of Ohio prevent themselves from having it? And are we to interfere to relieve them from restrictions which they imposed upon themselves, and which they can remove whenever they choose?

Mr. MORTON. The State of Ohio cannot organize a State bank as a bank of issue, for the reason that Congress has passed a law taxing the issues of that bank 10 per cent.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator spoke of bank capital, not of circulation.

Mr. MORTON. I was speaking of circulation. My friend understands that. Ohio cannot establish a bank of circulation because that circulation is taxed 10 per cent. by the United States. Therefore she is cut off as effectually as if there was a prohibition. The national-bank circulation is now restricted to $354,000,000. How does my friend stand in regard to that matter? My friend is opposed to having a dollar of circulation taken from Rhode Island. I think he is right about it. He says Rhode Island has got no more than she needs. He is opposed to having an increase of the whole amount of circulation to the amount of one dollar; he has said so. Therefore the position of my friend is that the States that have less than they need, that are growing rapidly, must remain just as they are. His State has got enough. She is satisfied. She can afford to hold still. Other States that have not got enough must be satisfied, must be content with what they have. That is the logic of it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator and I were talking of two very different things. He spoke of bank capital, and bank capital and bank circulation are constantly confounded in this debate. They are two very different things. If my friend holds that because we have more circulation issued by our banks in Rhode Island than they have in Indiana, we have more money in Rhode Island for that reason, we differ so widely that I do not think we should ever come together. When I contend against taking the circulation from the banks of Rhode Island, it is not because I believe it would make money any less plenty in Rhode Island, any more than I believe if you were to take a hogshead of water out of the Potomac you would make a hole in it. I believe it would come right back where it belongs. But I believe it would be an act of injustice to those institutions which were persuaded and compelled into the national banking system under the promise that they should have a certain profit, which is not a very large one. It is an injustice to them to take it from them. I do not believe it would make one particle of difference to the relative circulation of Rhode Island and Indiana if half our banks were taken from our State and carried there.

Mr. HAMLIN. Not a bit.

Mr. MORTON. Let me say to my friend from Maine that it would make a very large bit of difference; and why? The money that is issued by the banks of Rhode Island, and is loaned out, must come back there in payment of bills every few days, every two, or three, or four months. Consequently the money is constantly flowing back. It makes money plenty there. I am astonished to hear that argument made upon this floor, that it is just as well to have all the banks of circulation in one end of the country as to have them distributed all over the country. Men have to borrow money. They go to the banks to get that money; and when their bills become due they take the money back to those banks and pay it there, and there the money is to loan again. If they pay it back in Providence, it is there to be loaned again. If they pay it back in Indianapolis, it is there to be loaned again. It is a remarkable argument that it makes no difference where these banks are located.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to interrupt him just there, in order to strengthen his position? I should like the Senator from Rhode Island to answer this question: If it be true that money goes, without reference to the location of banks, where it is needed, I should like the Senator from Rhode Island to tell me why it was that cotton, which was needed by the manufacturers in the East, and needed abroad, this fall, could not be sold for ten cents, when it was worth from fifteen to twenty cents, by the markets of Liverpool? Why was it that money did not go to Georgia then? Why, sir, if I had owned ten thousand bales of cotton in the town in which I live, I could not have sold it, for days and days together, for five cents a pound. Why? Because the money was not there. The banks did not have the money. Adopting the similitude of the Senator from Rhode Island that it would flow like the water of the Potomac to the hole, why did it not flow to that hole then? I ask the Senator from Rhode Island, if he can, to answer that question.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the point made by the Senator from Rhode Island exactly touches the very question in dispute. Why is it important that each locality shall have its own bank if it is able to establish a bank? First, that it may have the advantage of bank credits. We know that bank credits take the place of currency.

Mr. ANTHONY. They can have them without circulation.

Mr. MORTON. In the next place, that they shall have the benefit of the circulation, because, as I said before, when a bank of circulation in Providence loans its money, that money must come back to Providence. Now, suppose we reverse it; suppose we take the circulating banks in Providence and put them down in Indianapolis; the money has to go there instead of going to Providence. Is it necessary that I should enforce a proposition of that kind? My friend says it makes no difference to Providence whether the banks of circulation are situated there, or in Boston, or in Indianapolis.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not a bit.

Mr. MORTON. Not a bit; but when it comes to giving up those banks of circulation, he says it is a great hardship; it is a wrong. Why? "Because they were forced to take it." They were not forced to take it. They have got twice as much as they formerly had. My friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] answered that argument the other day. He showed what the circulation of Rhode Island was before the war, and that it is more than doubled now. They were not forced to take it. They took it because it was profitable. I do not blame them for that. They want to keep it for the same reason. My friend fights against its being taken from them. He represents his constituents when he does so, and I justify him in doing so; but when he comes here and makes an argument that it does not make any difference after all whether they have those banks there or not, I am not satisfied with it. We are to be satisfied with the argument when we have not got the banks. They are to keep the banks upon the same argument.

Sir, our people cannot be satisfied with that argument. They want something more substantial; and I say to my friends now that if this national banking system cannot be made adjustable to the wants of the whole country it must give way. Much as I detest the old State banking system, and deplore its evils, I have no doubt the people will go back to it if this is to be a cast-iron system and the thing is to remain just as it is.

Let me say to my friends from the South, do not be deluded by the idea contained in the argument of my friend from Ohio. He says, "We will give you the $25,000,000; that will be enough for you; therefore, why are you talking about free banking?" I tell you you will never get the $25,000,000. This Senate can be amused with this sort of thing, as it has been for the last three months, for the next three months, until the session passes by, and nothing is done, and you or I will not live to see the time when $25,000,000 will be taken by violence from the banks of three or four States. I have no idea that that proposition will ever become the law of this country, or if it does, that it will ever be executed. It is a delusion. If you get increased circulation, you must get it in some other way, upon some better principle than that, and that is all we are contending for here.

There has been a certain sort of weakness running through all this debate, and that weakness was that, whenever a demand was made for the extension of equal banking facilities to all parts of the country it was an attack on New England. Who has made the attack on New England? Not I. It has been made by those who proposed to take from her $25,000,000 or $50,000,000 of her currency. Those are the gentlemen who make the attack upon New England. Those of us who want to leave New England what she has got, and simply ask that other parts of the country shall have what they need, are making no attack upon New England or upon the Eastern States.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I suggested in an undertone, in response to a remark that fell from the lips of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] that I did not think that if a part of this circulation were taken from Rhode Island it would make one mill difference in its circulation, and the Senator from Indiana, in consequence of that undertone remark that I made, addressed himself to me.

Mr. MORTON. Not offensively, I hope.

Mr. HAMLIN. Not at all. It is only in consequence of that that I wish now to say a very few words.

I can only say that he being a gentleman of so vigorous an intellect, and with a mind so comprehensive and so intelligent, I marvel at the course of the Senator from Indiana. It is indeed a day of marvels when we can hear, hour after hour, sentiments uttered in this Chamber such as those we have listened to, that there are to be no evil results from an unlimited issue of irredeemable paper money. That Senator has read to no account the history of irredeemable paper money if he is disposed to again inflict its evils upon us. I believe it would be worse than a pestilence that should stalk at noonday, and your panic of 1873 in the future would pale away into utter insignificance in the results that would follow such a wild and visionary scheme. I can conceive of no sane man arguing soberly such a proposition.

Now, sir, in relation to this currency. I affirm that you may take one-half of the circulation from Rhode Island, you may diminish by one-half the circulation which by law the banks in that State are entitled to to-day, and it will not affect her circulation one mill. What is it that controls the circulation of a bank, and where does that bank circulation go? It goes where the laws of trade and commerce carry it; and when the value of that currency is as good in Louisiana as it is in Rhode Island it will go there; when it is as good in Georgia to purchase cotton it goes there. I know that under the old system of local banks, when you had your weekly or monthly clearing-house banks, or houses appropriated to that purpose, where the banks were virtually compelled to redeem at those stated periods, the circulation had a locality, because the character of the bank beyond its own locality was not known, and there went back through these various clearing-houses the circulation of the local banks; but how is it with the banks to-day? If you go into any bank in Rhode Island, I hazard the opinion now that in all the transactions, in all the discounts and loans, of those banks they do not pay out one dollar of their own bills in a hundred. Indeed I have heard a cashier of one of the banks say that it was marvelous even to find at any time a single bill of their own bank in their transactions.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a word right there?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The banks of Providence loan their bills. A corresponding amount of money has to come back in payment of the bills or notes. They may not get their own bills, or only a small part of them, but an equal amount of money must go there every sixty, ninety, or one hundred and twenty days in payment; so that a like amount of money continually runs there, and it must run to every banking center. Therefore, although they send their money out in loans and they may not get the same bills back, they get a like amount of money back in payment of the debt; and that is the advantage of having the banks scattered all over the country, because the money goes back to the money centers all the time.

Mr. HAMLIN. And precisely so in relation to every locality. Whatever are the business transactions in Indiana, whatever may be the paper negotiated there, or whatever may be the purchases made by the merchants, there go the bills, the currency with which to negotiate and pay those transactions; and it is the currency of Rhode Island—I use that State for illustration, because it has been brought into this debate—it is the currency of Rhode Island that is used there, precisely as it would be used there if it were issued from a bank in the very town and neighborhood in which the transaction took place. There is just this and no more in the establishment of banks: They are convenient to the persons who have business to do at them; but when you come to the use of the circulation of the country, I affirm that it makes no difference whether the bank be established at the point where the business is negotiated or at another point under a system like ours—a system where the bill of an Indiana bank is just as good in the State of Maine as it is in the State of Indiana.

It is that uniform value of the currency that sends it through the channels of trade into the remotest corners of the Republic, and there it stays; and it is thus that the currency of the country holds its equilibrium, if I may use that term, or adjusts itself to a perfect system and makes it as good in one place and equal in volume with that of another place. That, sir, is my opinion.

Now they tell us in the West and they tell us in the South that they want more banks. I am disposed, if I can in any way consistent with my duty, to give to them the facilities of banks. I wish to do it; but I will vote here to-day to take $50,000,0000 from the New England banks and give it to other sections of the country before I will vote to increase an irredeemable paper currency one dollar. And yet the Senator says we resist it, and that it is an injustice. I grant that to a certain extent it may be. We entered into this banking system at a period of time when the Republic was rocking to its center, and when capital, always timid, was doubtful whether it would be a success or a failure, and we claim that we are entitled to some merit for the action that we took in that day; and we do say that this circulation is worth something to us—it is worth somewhere from 1½ to 2½ per cent. per annum; and, therefore, it is a hard measure now, after having diverted the capital of our banks into national banks, to ask us to contract our loans and our credits, and to place a portion elsewhere. But rather than meet the hazard and the evil of adding more irredeemable paper money to the currency I would cheerfully and willingly vote to take even a larger sum than this bill proposes from the New England States.

I think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] this morning struck the precise key-note to the remedy by which we may relieve the country. Why may we not provide by law that additional banks may be given to these localities where they say they want them, where they say they need them, where they say they have the capital to invest in them? Why may we not, without swelling our currency or adding to the irredeemable paper currency, allow them to do that precise thing, and retire an equal number of greenbacks when they do so? If they have the means to purchase the bonds on which to found the banks, they have the means to purchase the greenbacks; and then you do not add anything to the inflation of the currency and you do not injure the local banks or the banks now in existence by taking from them the circulation to which, under the existing law, they are entitled. I confess I cannot see any objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, and it is the precise course which had suggested itself to my mind as the one which we might most wisely adopt in this emergency; and I would carry along with that also the suggestion, made at an early day, I think, in the discussion upon the resolution submitted by the Committee on Finance, of purchasing a given quantity of gold to aid in the resumption of specie payment.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we can get out of our difficulties in that way; but if it be true that the only issue to be presented to us here and now is of increasing our currency, irredeemable as it is, then we may just as well meet that question now and here. I would deem it wise to recommit the whole subject, not that I would avoid a vote upon any proposition, however wild, in my judgment, or however abstract. When the Committee on Finance submitted to the Senate its resolution suggestive of instruction from the Senate to that committee, I thought it would have been a still better mode for them to have prepared a bill which should have contained within its provisions their suggestions for all the questions growing out of the present time. They did not do so. We have come to no vote upon that resolution; but I think it wiser now that the whole matter should go to the committee, that they may return to us a bill not like this present one, simply taking the circulation of banks from one section and diverting it to another, but one which shall embrace a compact system, and meet all the issues that necessarily grow out of the present time.

It seems to me that the very course of this debate furnishes us wisdom by which we might and should be directed. What is the precise question before us? It is a bill to divert certain currency from certain banks to others to be established. And what are you talking about? What is the practical question before the Senate? Hardly any connection with that, but one of creating a new volume of irredeemable paper money, with, as I say, no additional safeguards. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] tells us that there are the same provisions existing that existed at the time when these banks were created. True; but is it not equally true that we have been from the close of the war looking to a period of time when the good faith of the Government could be kept, and when our currency could be made equivalent in value to the metal; and I ask if, then, there is no difference in the time when that banking system was created and now, that should make a difference in our action between then and now?

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. MORTON. I want to ask my friend this question: If the volume of greenbacks is now the same, the number is not increased, how are the difficulties of the Government in the way of redeeming that given amount of greenbacks increased by adding to the volume of the national-bank paper?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will answer that question by a plain proposition. I have my notes out to-day for a given amount, and I have not got the ability to pay them, and to-morrow I propose to double that amount with no more ability to pay. I ask the Senator from Indiana if he thinks I can assume and meet my liabilities when they are doubled, when I cannot meet them upon half that amount? I ask if the Senator would not expect it would take a little longer period of time? Wealth is produced by labor, and in no other way, and it is the labor of your country that has got to furnish the means with which to pay your indebtedness; and it is a work of time. Now, sir, I say it will take a longer time for the labor of the country to pay the national indebtedness if you increase that indebtedness. That is my answer, and I think it is a practical one.

I have said in this discursive way something more than I meant to have said, and yet there is one other suggestion that I wish to make, now that I am on the floor. I suppose the men who framed this law were wiser than we are, and I do not know that it is respectful to those gentlemen even to comment upon their law. I know the old law tells us that the circulation of the country should be based upon wealth and population. I do not think there was anything of argument in all that language that went into the law. I think it was merely suggestive as an inducement to get the country to enter into that system of banking when it became necessary to save the life of the nation; but now that is made the basis of an argument, that the circulation of your country should be based upon population. I can conceive of nothing within the scope of my imagination more ridiculous. I do not believe they have got as many plows in Wall street as they have upon the prairies of Indiana; and you might tell me that you should undertake to regulate by law that they must have just as many plows, according to population, in Wall street as they have got upon the prairies of Indiana. The argument would address itself candidly to my judgment with just as much force if I were told they needed in that commercial center just the same number of agricultural implements that they needed in an agricultural locality; and the argument is just as sensible to my mind that they need banks as much in an agricultural community, in a sparsely settled country, as they do at commercial centers. You want currency to pay the small balances of trade; you want to pay the differences at the clearing-houses; you want enough to pay the ordinary transactions in daily life; and that is all the currency you need unless you want to set afloat a wild scheme of speculation, or unless you may happen to be somewhat indebted and want an inflated currency to pay debts upon.

We have got partially out of the terrible calamities of the war. It may, perhaps, be said that we have got our head and shoulders out. Is it wise again to immerse the country into paper money and ask us to go over again just so much of the ground as we have trodden already? And will it not be precisely that in result if we go back to that condition of things which existed only a few years ago? It looks so to me; and looking at it in that way, while I have every disposition in the world to concede to every locality, North and South, East and West, every facility that shall be necessary, and to give them all the quota even of banks upon population if they can furnish the means to establish them, yet it does seem to me marvelous that we should see here, when the sun is going down upon the nineteenth century, and with all the lights of the world before us, reasonable, sane men asking for an issue of more irredeemable paper money.

From the manner in which my very esteemed friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] spoke yesterday, I could not doubt that there was in his earnest and honest convictions a belief that there was a majority in the Senate in favor of doing that very thing; and I confess when I witnessed his earnestness, and when I had been appealed to to know what was my position, for the purpose of canvassing the Senate, I did fear that the Senator was right. I hope, however, that it may prove otherwise, and that we may find a mode of giving to those sections which are demanding them more banks, without incurring the perils that must come upon us as certain as the sun shall perform its circuit in the heavens if we again flood this land with more irredeemable paper money.

One thing more. The Senator from Indiana said, in reply to a suggestion from the Senator from Ohio, that his argument was inconsistent, because he said that if you had free banking the country would be flooded with paper money, and if you passed this bill it would last two years, and the $25,000,000 would not be used. I do not see the inconsistency. When you open the door without limitation, let me tell the Senator from Indiana that the States in which the larger and preponderating amount of capital is situated to-day could and would establish four banks where the States that have not now their quota would establish one. Consequently, if you limit and place at distinct points the $25,000,000, it may be true, as the Senator from Ohio said, that you would not use it within a given time, two years, while if you had a system unrestricted, then, although there are more banks in certain localities than there are in others, the greatest amount would be established in those places still, and yet any circulation that they might furnish under the present system would find its own level.

Mr. President, I did not mean to say so much as I have.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I believe the pending motion is to recommit this whole subject to the Committee on Finance. I have usually voted with my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] upon all questions affecting the finances of the country. I very generally agree with him in his ideas of what ought to be done and his methods of doing it; but I am not quite satisfied with the wisdom of this proposition of his. I do not at this moment see the advantage of recommitting this subject to the Committee on Finance. I do not see how they can enter upon the consideration of the subject with any light which has not been before them for years. They have known for months and years the condition of the country. They have had so much to guide them always. It is very true that if the subject goes back to them again and now, they will have whatever aid they can get from a pretty protracted and rather voluminous debate. They will not have the aid of a single expression of opinion on the part of the Senate itself; and, for myself, I should doubt their getting very much light out of the debate. I should be rather more afraid they would be smothered than illuminated by it. Therefore, I am inclined to think the subject had better be kept here a little longer.

I was the more inclined to this opinion when I heard my friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] say last evening that in spite of this long-drawn-out debate he had not arrived at a conviction upon any one proposition which had been mooted. That is discouraging. If we have spent all these weeks in debate without conveying a conviction to one so clear-sighted as my honorable friend from Maine, I think we must be very persistent, very diffuse, very laborious, if we expect, by debate, to bring the whole Senate to one conviction upon all the propositions which have been debated here. With that necessity before us, I am persuaded we had better go on; we had better keep the subject here.

Besides, sir, if we send it back to that committee, they will occupy some time in deliberation. They cannot report it back to-morrow or next day, probably not next week. In the mean time the Senate becomes engrossed with other topics, and whatever proposition they bring back to us by and by will come to us with something of the freshness of novelty, although it may have been talked of over and over again in these past days. We shall come back to it again, and this debate would very likely be repeated again. It seems to me, therefore, that time must be lost by a recommittal, and truth in the end be rendered no more secure.

I heard my honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] say just now that upon one point he had changed his mind. I do not know but that I shall convict myself of having changed my own upon one point before I sit down. About the only thing I know, or ever supposed I knew, about finance, was this: not that we had too much or too little circulation in the United States; not that too much or too little of it was in this State or in that, in this section or in the other; but the one thing I thought I did know was that there were certain communities in that portion of the country which I best know, communities which have almost come into existence since your national banking law was first enacted, communities which have grown very much in numbers and in business since that time, communities which require banking facilities, have been seeking them year after year, and have been excluded from them by your law. I have wanted to relieve against that one positive local want which I thought I knew was a real one. There being capital, no matter whether in those localities or elsewhere—that is not the concern of the Government, nor mine—there being capital somewhere, which, if you permit it, would offer banking facilities to those communities, I thought your law should offer those facilities. I have wanted to relieve against that deprivation.

Senators around me, particularly and notably the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, recognize that as a real want, recognize that as the creature of your law, and he came before us some weeks since with a proposition to relieve it. His proposition was to withdraw a certain amount of banking circulation from a quarter of the Union where it is supposed to be somewhat in excess, and to distribute that among these communities which complain of this deficiency. Well, I could not vote against that. Whenever it is brought to a vote in the Senate I shall have to vote for it. I did not like it when it was first proposed here. I have not grown fond of it since it first came here. I sympathize with the outcry that is raised on the part of that portion of the country which is to be rifled, which is to be raided upon. I believe with the Senator from Indiana that this measure will not be altogether healing in its effects; that if it heals a wound in one part of the country it will create a wound in another part of the country. Besides that, it is not manly, it is not statesman-like. What is the complaint which you have heard on the part of the South and of the West? Not that Rhode Island had too much bank circulation or bank capital; not that New York had; not that New England had; but that certain communities in the West and in the South were denied their equal rights, their equal privileges under your law; that your law created a privilege and confined it to a portion of the people of the United States. That is not the office of law; that is not the privilege of law. When your law creates a franchise, a privilege, when it has defined the conditions upon which one man, or one community, or one corporation, may circulate paper as money, if it undertakes to restrict that right to a portion of the American people, and to exclude from it another portion of the American people, it is a monopoly which has been denounced by all right law for two hundred years.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] says—and I cannot pass the occasion—that it was not denounced by the Supreme Court in the Slaughter-house cases. I have two replies to make; that it does not militate at all against what I said, for two reasons: first, the Supreme Court argued that there was no monopoly before them in that case. If they were wrong on that and did not denounce it, I still insist upon what I said, because then it was not the law that spoke. The law for two hundred years has denounced monopolies.

I said this proposition did not strike me as statesman-like; for when we ask to have this restriction removed from us, what is the reply? Not that it is not a restriction; not that it ought not to be removed; but instead of any proposition from any quarter, unless I accept the proposition which was moved last evening by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] to wipe off this restriction and admit all portions of the country to an equal participation in these privileges, my honorable friend from Ohio proposes to get up a donation party, I take it, (for it resembles that more than anything else,) to call upon New England to visit the distressed portions of the country with such little contributions as she can afford. We are always glad to see our friends from New England when they come forward voluntarily, either on a charitable mission or any other—very glad to see them; but when they come to us in the name of charity, we want them to come smiling—at least not with such outcries, not with such complaints as I have heard day after day on this floor. If we have got to take their book of lamentations with their contributions, I would rather go without their contributions.

I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] I agree with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] that this is wrong treatment for the banks of New England. But I think I never saw a community so anxious to be outraged as they seem to be. They really insist upon having this wrong perpetrated. If they do, how can I help myself? I said, therefore, that if you brought me to vote on this proposition, I should have to vote for it. I should like to be spared that humiliation. And, Mr. President, I think there is a way of escape open. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] has discovered it. He proposes that instead of making a raid on our New England communities in order to recapture a little bank circulation, the bank circulation shall be increased: I think he proposes an increase of forty-six millions of banking circulation. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] goes him better, and proposes an unlimited increase; that is to say, an increase unrestricted by law. Now I want to see that day. Then your law will be right in that respect; it will be relieved from the imputation of having created privileges for a portion of the American people. I think, therefore, I shall be compelled. Compelled? No, sir; not under any spur that I know of except it be that of my own convictions—I shall be privileged to vote for this proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania; and then your law will be more wholesome than I think it is at present.

I think some danger might grow out of that measure standing by itself. I do not think that will cure every ill under which you are now suffering. I only count upon it to cure two—not enough, but better than none. It will reduce the number of the ills we labor under; it will cure two; it will break up that monopoly now existing, and it will relieve us from this necessity of making a raid on any portion of the country for present relief. But then there will be other evils in our system which will require attention. Notably there will be this one, that you will still have afloat in this community a circulation of from three hundred and fifty to four hundred millions of promissory notes issued by your Government, notes by which—I say again, in spite of what has been said to the contrary—your Government promised to pay certain sums of money. They will be afloat still, still unpaid. The proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania does not reach that difficulty—does not propose to touch it at all. I do not think the rest of us should lose sight of it.

My honorable friend from Iowa, who sits before me, [Mr. ALLISON,] reminds me in good time that that proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be open to amendment when it gets before the Senate. I am glad to hear that. Not having seen anything amended for a long time, I was naturally oblivious of that little fact. [Laughter.] Yes, it will be open to amendment. Why not amend it? Why not, when you offer this provision to the capital of the country to furnish it with banking facilities everywhere to any extent that it will comply with the conditions of your present banking law, also say to the holders of these different promises, "If you are tired of them, if you would rather have an obligation of the Government paying an interest of 5 per cent., not to be paid on demand, but to be paid at some future time, take it?" Why not say that by way of amendment of the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania? What is the objection to that? It cannot contract your circulation, because here is the capital of the whole country to furnish you circulation based upon the credit of the Government of the United States. Why not then say to the holders of these greenbacks, "If you want to exchange them for a 5 per cent. bond, do it?"

My honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] may say, as I think I heard him say a short time ago, that this is the best currency in the world, the best currency we ever had, and that we cannot afford to give it up. Mr. President, I cannot agree with my honorable friend on that proposition. It is as good as I want myself, I admit, when I have no other use for money but to pay my bills at the hotels here in Washington, or on the way between this and my home in Wisconsin; as good as I want when I have nothing to do with money but take up my note which my honorable friend may hold. But, Mr. President, after all that is said in justice to this currency, it is not a good currency; for when you go to the clearing-house of the world, then you find that it lacks somewhere from 8 to 20 per cent. of being good; never good at its face there, where the exchanges of the productions of all the world are made. That is not its worst difficulty. The worst thing to be said of it is that it is at one figure one day and at another figure another day. Within the last four months, I think—within the last six months, any way—it has pendulated all the way from 8 to 18 per cent.

Mr. STEWART. About 10 per cent. difference.

Mr. HOWE. The extreme fluctuation being 10 per cent., Mr. President, that is not a wholesome kind of currency. I believe this, and I can prove, I guess, right where I stand, that the power to "coin money" is one of the most delicate and one of the gravest powers with which a government is clothed. To coin money is a pretty solemn enterprise; it is a pretty grave undertaking. The government which undertakes that task owes it to mankind to make the very best article it can. And what are the most essential qualities of such an agent? One is that it should be as little fluctuating in value itself as possible; one is that it should be as portable as possible; one is that it should be as enduring as possible. A more indispensable element than either or than all these, I think, is this: that, so far as 'is possible, it should be a commodity equally desirable to every person on the face of the earth. To be a perfect money it should be a money having these qualities that I speak of, and in them something equally desired by everybody on the face of the earth. No paper can ever have this last quality, no matter who makes it—whether a bank or a government. No coin can realize it fully. A coin upon which all the commercial nations of the earth had agreed in stamping one value would come pretty near this quality. But the Government having fixed the character of the commodity which shall be known as money, having complied with these conditions, made the best article it can, then one other duty rests upon it, in my judgment, to wit: that in time of peace, except moved by some great exigency, that government is criminal which allows anybody to circulate anything else as money unless it be convertible into this money on demand. The government which authorizes my friend, myself, or you, or a bank, to circulate its promises as money upon any other condition than that they shall be converted on demand into that which the law acknowledges to be money, is criminal; and when the Government undertakes to circulate its own promises, not convertible, it too is criminal. I cannot doubt it. There is no escape from it.

I must not be misunderstood. I recognize the full nature of that great exigency which forced our Government upon this experiment of circulating its own notes. I know all about that. I know what their divine mission has been. I know how beneficent the action of this paper has been heretofore. But, sir, that was to meet an emergency, an emergency which has passed; and I always thought, while that was the only exigency I had ever seen which would warrant such an experiment, that the Government meant and that the Government ought to do what on the face of this paper it said it would do—pay it and get it out of the way.

Mr. President, instead of looking with any dread upon the retiring of these greenbacks, therefore, I have only one anxiety about it, that it shall not be done in such a way as to lessen the facility for paying the existing obligations of the country.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend say how he would do it? Perhaps I did not hear that part of his speech. How would he retire them?

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I would authorize your Secretary of the Treasury, just as fast as he issues bank-notes under the proposed law of my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] to convert an interest-bearing bond into greenbacks, and burn up the greenbacks; and there you are with the same amount of circulation that you had before, varying in character; there are a hundred thousand or a million less, as the case may be, of United States notes, but the same quantity of bank-notes in their places.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. How would you have the banks redeem?

Mr. HOWE. I do wish my friend from Connecticut would not ask me questions; but he does. He wants to know how I would have the banks redeem. I would have them redeem their debts just as my friend redeems his, in legal-tenders.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Where would be the legal-tenders then?

Mr. HOWE. Next week $100,000 of them are converted into bonds; the next week $1,000,000; and so on; and by and by I should hope, in God's providence, the last one would disappear. How would the banks redeem their paper then? In what was left with the character of legal tender upon it. I do not know of anything that would be left but coin. I should not expect anything to be left of that character but coin. I should expect the banks to redeem their paper in coin, the coin of the Republic.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWE. I give way.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I should like to have the Senator show how the banks can redeem their notes in coin when the legal-tender notes shall all be retired or converted into bonds; and how the banks can maintain that redemption, if the Government cannot maintain it now? What ability will there be in the banks, or what change will there be in the business relations of this country, to enable the banks to furnish on demand all the coin which may be necessary to meet the balance of trade against us, when the Government cannot do it?

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to my friend from Connecticut that that is a pretty hard conundrum. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. Now that is discouraging. [Laughter.] When I have my honorable friend from Connecticut to put questions, and my honorable friend from Indiana to make affidavits that they cannot be answered, it is a little discouraging.

Mr. President, am I mistaken about this? I say the Government of the United States cannot redeem its promises in coin; and the reason I assign for that is because the Government of the United States is a bankrupt, is a pauper, without resources, without a dollar for that purpose. It can lay taxes. That is the end of its resources. It is liable to be called into a court of bankruptcy, my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] suggests to me, because its paper has been unpaid for fourteen days. The Government can lay taxes. That is the end of its resources. It never does and never dares to lay a tax except to meet a current expense. That is one reason why the Government cannot redeem its paper.

There is another reason. It has no business relations with everybody; it has no breath; it has no life. Everybody preys on the Government; everybody goes for the Treasury. When there is a chance to grab something there, the grab is made, if it is nothing more than an additional salary. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I do not think capitalists could redeem the same amount of paper. I do not think a bank can pay four dollars with one, any more than the Government can. That is not what specie payment means. It means simply that those who furnish the paper will supply to the holders of the paper whatever amount of coin the business of the country demands. That very thing has been done from the time your banks closed in 1861 down to this time. Capital has furnished business with all the coin it needed.

Mr. STEWART. Just as they do in France now.

Mr. HOWE. So here now, you want to pay a bill of exchange in London or in Paris; go into a bank and you will get it. Capital supplies it now. The bank charges you a premium, to be sure. Why? Not because that enables them any better to furnish the bill. They charge you that premium because some uncrucified whelps who were gambling yesterday on Wall street ran the premium up to 12 or 15 per cent. That is the reason why the bank here charges you a premium. Capital does furnish this coin. While you make believe it does not, it furnishes it. If you were to change your countenance and all make believe that it did, I think capital, instead of straining harder to furnish coin, would furnish it much easier. I admit that if a panic should sweep the country; if you were all to be overtaken by lunacy at once; if you had a bank-note circulation of $800,000,000, and everybody who had any of these notes should be suddenly overtaken by the insane idea that he must have a dollar of coin for it, he would not be able to get it. That would not be the fault of the banking system, it would not be the fault of the banks, it would be your fault. Banks always have, with scarcely an exception, met the real obligation existing between them and their customers; that is, furnished so much coin as was required for business. When in addition to that a scared people have raided upon them for what they did not want, the banks have not been able to respond.

Sir, I must pass over this whole matter, simply by repeating my conviction that instead of this greenback currency being the best currency in the world, that which is convertible into nothing, a paper of solid value, representing capital, and convertible into the coin of the Republic, is a paper infinitely to be preferred.

But, Mr. President, we ought to agree to one or the other of these propositions. The world was very old indeed before we resorted to the expedient of a Government paper. I do not think when that expedient was resorted to anybody contemplated that we should ever undertake to keep that in circulation, and to make it convertible on demand into coin. But if it be the judgment of the statesmen who occupy seats on this floor to-day that the Government can fix itself in some way in which it can keep this paper in circulation, and make it convertible, and that bank paper cannot be made so convertible, say that—try it. If you can do it, if it is the right of the Government to circulate the paper, it should circulate the whole of it; it should not share this privilege with any private corporation whatever. There should be no two opinions, in my judgment, on that point.

I do not see what practical difficulty there is, therefore, in our beginning to vote some time or other, if I should ever get through with my remarks, [laughter,] on some of these propositions. I do not see, if you are really willing that other portions of the country should have any banking facilities, why you should not do it in accordance with the plan suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] The only possible objection I think that can be urged or has been urged against that, is the danger of inflation. Well, if you provide some such waste-gate as I have suggested, taking up the excess, funding your excess in the bonds of the Government, then you are guarded against inflation. I see no objection to that, unless you are unwilling that the people of the United States should pay 5 per cent. interest for money. I do not think any one is going to take that ground. I do not think that is an unreasonable interest to pay. So then, if no one else does, when the time comes, I think I shall offer an amendment in accordance with the suggestion of my friend from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I hope the Senate will agree to it; and if the Senate should agree to it, I shall have great pleasure in voting then for that bill which will remove these restrictions on banking.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope my friend from Wisconsin will not interpret me as proposing any amendment. I simply suggested that it would be open to amendment.

Mr. HOWE. He put the possibility of moving an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not care to father the amendment.

Mr. HOWE. Now I do not want to sit down without saying to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] one thing. When he was on the floor a short time since, I rose to ask him a question for information, and the Senator objected to being interrupted. Mr. President, I waived my right; but I want to submit to the Senator that it was my parliamentary and my constitutional right to interrupt him for the purpose of asking a question. When one is making a formal speech, it is not quite good taste to indulge in such interruptions; but the Senator from Ohio, I submit, is employed as a teacher. He stands at the head of the Finance Committee. He is ex officio the teacher of the Senate. This is the subject with which he is especially familiar. I insist we have a right to ask him, in addition to his speeches which he makes for the general enlightenment of the Senate, that he shall give special lessons to any neophyte, particularly, anxious to be informed on this subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer my friend any question he may put to me. I do not consider myself able to teach him, but I will try to answer any question.

Mr. HOWE. The privilege I asked was this specific one; it was this specific privilege that was denied. I am not arraigning the Senator; I am not finding fault with him; I am only asserting what I think is the right of a Senator on this floor; particularly when the floor is occupied by one especially charged with the investigation of a particular subject, we have a right to put inquiries to him about it. This might be abused. I know very well the Senator from Ohio will not insist that I have ever abused it, or intended to abuse it. Debate cannot have its full benefits, its full advantages, without this right.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator takes his seat, I will say that I am ready to answer any question he puts; but, at the same time, I do object, as a matter of daily practice, to this constant interruption of Senators. Indeed, it has grown up of late; and I think we ought not to have any questioning unless when a Senator is through, and then if any Senator desires to make an inquiry let him put it, and it can be properly answered.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have not said a word on this great subject, and if the Senate is not impatient to adjourn at this hour, I should like to occupy about fifteen minutes.

Mr. FENTON. Would not the Senator prefer to go on to-morrow?

Mr. THURMAN. No; because I have no set speech to make; and I have risen to say what I have to say in the briefest possible time.

The Finance Committee of the Senate reported a bill to carry into execution a previous law which has not been executed, and the non-execution of which, in my humble judgment, is without sufficient excuse. Forthwith this bill, perfectly simple in its character, providing for nothing but the execution of a law which we ourselves passed but a few years ago, is loaded down with every possible kind of proposition that the ingenuity of man can devise on the subject of finance, banking, and the currency—propositions the most inconsistent, and some of them, to use a very mild term, the most extraordinary.

This satisfies me that you cannot touch any branch of this question in this body without having the whole subject brought into discussion; not simply speeches made upon it, but propositions submitted for legislation, and legislation of the largest and most important character. Although the charters of the national banks do not expire, any of them I believe, before 1884, now ten years in advance of that we are to have a discussion upon the relative merits of national-bank-note currency and greenbacks, and measures to be taken either to enlarge and perpetuate the national-bank system or to dispense with it altogether; and that, too, upon every finance measure that the committee can report.

Mr. President, it has been said that the American people are eminently practical. I begin to believe that the Senate of the United States has not that characteristic. That it is eminently talkative the debates on finance for the last two months have amply shown. I take my full share of the responsibility for talking on other matters. On this, fortunately for me, I have perfectly clean skirts.

Now, sir, in view of the fact that the Senate will not let the committee report any measure, and let it stand on its own merits, and either adopt it or vote it down, but will load it with all sorts of propositions upon the general subject, I am for recommitting this bill to the committee, and let them bring in what they in their wisdom think is the best measure to be submitted to the Senate. They have shown that they think themselves competent to do that thing, and I confess that I have been slightly amused when I have looked at the resolution which they reported, and also at the amendments that have been proposed to it. On the 10th of December last, more than two months ago, the Committee on Finance reported this resolution:

Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress during its present session to adopt definite measures to redeem the pledge made in the act approved March 18, 1869, entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," as follows: "And the United States also pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin;" and the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, such measures as will not only redeem this pledge of the public faith, but will also furnish a currency of uniform value, always redeemable in gold or its equivalent, and so adjusted as to meet the changing wants of trade and commerce.

Mr. President, it must be borne in mind all the time that this resolution comes from the committee, and it therefore assumes that that committee is capable of doing, what? That it is capable of reporting measures that will redeem the pledge of the United States "to provide at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin." The committee asserts its competency to do that. In the next place, it asserts its competency to report measures that will "furnish a currency of uniform value, always redeemable in gold or its equivalent." That is the second thing that it affirms its competency to do. Then in the third place, to report measures for such a currency as will be "so adjusted as to meet the changing wants of trade and commerce," whatever that may mean. Now, if the committee has this competency, which it asserts by offering this resolution, I want it to report its measures; and the only wonder is that it has not reported them long ago. Why did they come to the Senate to ask us to tell them to do that which they assert they are able to do? They had the whole subject before them by the reference of that portion of the President's message relating to finance and the currency to that committee, and from the very constitution of the committee and its functions and duties as prescribed by the Senate. I can see some reason why this tub was thrown to the whale—to produce a lengthened debate in the Senate while the country recovered from the panic in which it was plunged last September, and which continued to some extent even to the meeting of the Congress; but, as a practicable measure, as a practicable initiation of legislation, what in the world was the use of that resolution?

The committee which is charged with the consideration of this subject, and which is supposed, and rightly supposed, no doubt, to have more information upon it than anybody else in the Senate or than the great body of Senators, affirms its competency to do that which it considers to be so desirable for the country, and which so large a portion of the Senate and of the whole country think is so desirable; and yet instead of reporting a measure, we have had two months' debate upon a mere abstraction, and all the political economy that could be found in books or in newspapers has been dealt out to the Senate of the United States.

I do not say this because I assume to scold or to reproach any gentleman, or to condemn the course that has been taken; but I do say that it strikes a practical man as a little extraordinary indeed that, when the committee is competent to do what this resolution professes it to be competent to do, it has not done it long ago; and I am for giving it the opportunity to do it.

Then we had a substitute for this resolution offered by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FERRY] who asks us to strike out all after the word "resolved," and instruct the committee as follows:

That the Committee on Finance is directed to report to the Senate at as early a day as practicable such measures as will restore commercial confidence—

What does that mean, I should like to know? What "commercial confidence" is shaken that requires legislation to restore it? I should like to have some explanation of that; I have heard none yet. Then what next?— and give stability and elasticity to the circulating medium.

That is a little funny.

Mr. HAMLIN. India rubber.

Mr. THURMAN. No; if it was made out of India rubber it would not be stable. It is to be stable; that is, to be fixed; and it is to be elastic; that is, it is not to be fixed. [Laughter.] That is that thing. Then as to the modus of making it stable and elastic, that is, fixed and not fixed; that is, "through a moderate increase of the currency." I have heard nothing like that since General Jackson's famous letter about "a judicious tariff," which captured Pennsylvania; for who was there that could oppose a judicious tariff? Now, what is "a moderate increase of the currency?" I should like to know. One gentleman says $46,000,000, another says $80,000,000, and some papers in the country are saying a thousand millions. What is "a moderate increase of the currency?" Is there any use in sending such instructions as this to the committee? What light do they shed upon this subject? What advantage to the committee are they? What directions do they give to them? This assumes that they can do, what? That they can report measures that will restore commercial confidence. Well, the committee have not said that. They assume a great competency by their own resolution, but they have not assumed that. Then they are to report measures that will give "stability and elasticity to the circulating medium." That I think would trouble them; and then that can be done "through a moderate increase of the currency." Well, I want them to investigate and see what they can do. I do not want to tell them to do it, for I have very great doubts whether they can do it—immense doubts whether they can do it. Until they affirm that they are competent to do that, as they have affirmed that they are competent to do that which is prescribed in the original resolution, I will not give them any instructions on the subject.

But now, Mr. President, a few practical words on this question. Is it not plain that we cannot in open session mature any measure ab initio on this subject? Are we going to dispense with the Finance Committee? Is it a committee of no use, has it no functions to perform, has it no special competency for its duty, that we shall take everything out of its hands, and whenever it reports anything, any measure, however plain and practical and simple it may be, the Senate must go to work and draft here in the Senate measures that shall regulate all the financial and banking and business of the country? No, sir; there is no use in having a committee if that is to be attempted.

The right way, in my humble judgment, is to send these measures back, without instructions, to that committee where they belong and to whom they were committed by our reference of the President's message last December. Send this bill back to that committee; and let it in its own wisdom report to us such measures as in its belief the interest of the country demands. Then it will be for us to consider them, and to agree with them or disagree with them, to amend and modify them if necessary, or reject them altogether, or adopt them. That is the way to get at practical legislation. If you pursue the course you have been taking, I venture to say that the end of this session will find us without one single practical measure upon this subject on the statute-book. You will never get any practical measure at all until you devolve on this committee, to which the subject belongs, the duty, and the responsibility too, of recommending such practical measures in the form of legislation as in their judgment they think are wise. You go on here with a debate indefinite and interminable, until everybody will get sick with it, country and all. But send it back to the committee; they will have had the benefit of the opinions that have been expressed, the able speeches no doubt that have been made; and let them frame such a measure as they in their judgment think right, and bring that before the Senate for its consideration. I shall therefore vote to refer back the whole subject whenever I can get the opportunity to do it, to that committee, and without any instructions whatsoever.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I wish to say a single word. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] proposed a question to me, and I endeavored to get the floor to reply, but I was superseded by Senators who are much better able to discuss the question than I am; and I did not care to intrude. If I understood him aright, the Senator from Georgia asked me if there was money enough, if there were no evils that an increased amount of currency would not cure, why it was that there was a few months ago such an enormous discrepancy between the price of the great staple of the South in southern markets and in the northern markets; why it was when cotton could be sold at ten cents a pound in the southern markets, and was worth a great deal more than that in the northern markets, it was not purchased at the South, and why men in the North did not take advantage of that state of affairs, and the men in the South did not take advantage of it? I do not see the pertinence of the question to the matter which is under consideration, because, certainly, it could not have been owing to any difference in the currency. The relations between the cotton markets of the North and the cotton markets of the South are now in their normal condition; and yet, with the exception of the additional issue of part of the forty-four million reserve, which I think is not more than twenty-five millions, there is no more currency afloat now than there was before. It could not have been owing to any deficiency of currency, because if it was owing to that it would not be cured now. But, moreover, the same disturbance of the relations between the cotton markets of Liverpool and the cotton markets of the South existed, as between the cotton markets of the Northern States and the cotton markets of the South. Certainly there was money enough in Liverpool. I suppose the reason was the panic which disturbed, overthrew, and for the time almost annihilated all the laws of trade and of finance. The reason was because no man dared to make any future contracts; because the manufacturers either closed their mills or bought from hand to mouth. No man dared to put out his obligations. Now we see the normal condition of things restored, and, practically, upon the same volume of currency.

I think my friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] put a question to me, why it was if we did not think the disproportionate amount of currency which we have in our section of the country was an advantage, we were so unwilling to have it withdrawn. My friend from Indiana did not listen to me in the few remarks I made on this question with anything like the attention that I always do to him or he would have known that I never have objected to withdrawing the currency upon any other grounds than that to do so would be unjust to the banks with which we made a contract. We told them that if they would invest in this system of banking they should have certain advantages. I think it is not fair, I think it is not good faith, to take them away. So far as the State of Rhode Island is concerned, we shall have more money to loan if this circulation is taken from us than we have now, because for every ninety dollars we have put out we have had to buy a hundred-dollar bond which costs $115, and then we have to put 15 per cent. in the reserve. But I say it is unfair to those with whom we made the contract. It is a violation of public faith.

Mr. MORTON. I would say to my friend, as he lives on the coast, that when a wave breaks on the shore and dashes up on the beach, the water runs right back into the ocean. So when the banks of Providence throw out their currency in loans and discounts to any part of the country, it runs right back to the bank center. That is what always takes place. That is the advantage of having banks everywhere.

Mr. ANTHONY. But you must have the water. How are you going to get the currency unless you have the capital to buy it with? If you apportion ten millions of currency to the State of Indiana, she must have the capital to get the currency with, and the capital of Indiana can be employed much more profitably than in banking.

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to suggest there that that is one of the mistakes that the Senator and others have made in this debate all the time. They say we have not got the water; we have not got the capital. They assume that we are poor.

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir.

Mr. MORTON. If we are poor, of course we cannot take it. I say we have the capital; but we cannot invest it, because you do not allow us to do so.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg pardon of my friend. I say the State of Indiana can employ its capital more profitably than in banking, not that it has not capital.

Mr. MORTON. Let us judge.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let not my friend put into my mouth what I did not say.

Mr. MORTON. No.

Mr. ANTHONY. We know Indiana is wealthy; and I say it may employ its wealth more profitably than putting it into bank circulation, which yields about 1½ per cent. profit.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Evidently we shall not conclude this bill to-night, and I want a short executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 2074) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of a military prison, and for its government," approved March 3, 1873; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President of the Senate pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1761) granting certain swamp lands in Holt County, Missouri, to said Holt County, for school purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1769) for the relief of Colonel Daniel McClure, assistant paymaster-general.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1284) authorizing the chief clerk of the War Department to sign requisitions on the Treasury during the temporary absence of the Secretary of War, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 2073) restricting the refunding of customs duties and prescribing certain regulations of the Treasury Department, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 2074) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of a military prison and for its government," approved March 3, 1873, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 17, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at ten minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports are in order from the Committee on Military Affairs.

WAR DEPARTMENT REQUISITIONS.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1284) authorizing the chief clerk of the War Department to sign requisitions on the Treasury during the temporary absence of the Secretary of War, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that when, from illness or other cause, the Secretary of War is temporarily absent from the War Department, he may authorize the chief clerk of the Department to sign requisitions upon the Treasury Department, and other papers requiring the signature of said Secretary; the same, when signed by the chief clerk during such temporary absence, to be of the same force and effect as if signed by the Secretary of War himself.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inqure whether this practice has been indulged in by any other Department of the Government? It confers important powers upon this chief clerk.

Mr. COBURN. It has not been indulged in by any other Department, but there is no Assistant Secretary of War. It is a matter of convenience, and is recommended by the Secretary of War himself. It is one which, so far as the committee can see, will work no harm. Of course the Secretary of War will not authorize it except in extreme cases.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a grave responsibility to impose upon this chief clerk.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF TOBACCO TO THE ARMY.

Mr. COBURN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back, with the recommendation that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it do lie on the table, a bill to authorize the issue of tobacco to enlisted men of the Army.

The SPEAKER. There does not appear to be any record that this bill was ever referred to the committee.

Mr. COBURN. It was referred in connection with a communication of the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. This is an illustration of the inexpediency of having bills referred in that way.

Mr. COBURN. Let the record be altered so as to refer to the communication of the Secretary of War.

There was no objection; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Secretary of War, asking the passage of a law providing for the issue of tobacco to the enlisted men of the Army.

GENERAL DON CARLOS BUELL.

Mr. COBURN. I am instructed to present a report of the Committee on Military Affairs, in relation to the communication of the Secretary of War, concerning a copy of the proceedings in the matter of the court of inquiry in the case of General Don Carlos Buell. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read. The committee to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War in relation to the copy of the proceedings in the matter of the court of inquiry in the case of General Don Carlos Buell, which is to be furnished by him to Congress, state that they have had the same under consideration, and find that a copy has been put on file in the office of the Secretary of War; that there is no fund out of which to pay for the required copy, and no clerk to do the work. They therefore recommend that the sum of $500 be appropriated to employ a copyist to do the work of transcribing the said record, which the report of the Secretary of War shows to contain one hundred thousand words. The committee recommend the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to report in the proper bill an appropriation of $500 to enable the Secretary of War to furnish Congress with a copy of the proceedings of the court of inquiry concerning General Don Carlos Buell.

The resolution reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was agreed to.

NAVIGATION OF SNAKE RIVER, IDAHO.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 442) authorizing the Secretary of War to have a survey and estimate made of the cost of removing obstructions to navigation from Snake River in the Territory of Idaho; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY PRISON.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I am also instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the bill (H. R. No. 1035) with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute (H. R. No. 2074) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the establishment of a military prison, and for its government," approved March 3, 1873, was received and read a first and second time.

The bill proposes so to amend the said act that all acts and things therein required to be done and performed at Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, shall be done and performed at the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, provided that the Government buildings, now on said military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, shall be modified and used, so far as practicable, for the purposes of said prison.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. At the last session of Congress a law was passed for the purpose of establishing a military prison at Rock Island, in the State of Illinois. That act was approved on the last day of the session, the 3d of March. The first section of that act is in these words:

That there shall be established at Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, a prison for the confinement and reformation of offenders against the rules, regulations, and laws for the government of the Army of the United States, in which shall be securely confined, and employed at labor, and governed in the manner hereinafter directed, all offenders convicted before any court-martial or military commission in the United States, and sentenced according to law to imprisonment therein.

The act contains twelve sections. It provides, among other things, for the appointment of a board of commissioners, to consist of five members, three of whom shall be officers of the regular Army, and two chosen from civil life. The act makes it the business of these commissioners to establish the prison, to locate the place where it shall be properly located at Rock Island, and also to prescribe the rules for its government.

Under the authority given to the Secretary of War by this act, he appointed three officers of the regular Army for the purpose of locating the prison. This commission visited Rock Island last summer and made to the Secretary of War a report of their doings at some time previous to the present session. The report does not seem to bear any date. This board of Army officers in their report have presented to Congress the regulations which they have deemed proper to adopt for the government of the military prison. They also made a report on the practicability of locating this prison at all on Rock Island military reservation.

It was unquestionably the intention of Congress to locate the prison on the military reservation at Rock Island, although the language is simply "at Rock Island, in the State of Illinois." It was the intention of Congress to locate it on the military reservation, for the reason that the Government owned the grounds. These commissioners upon examining the locality, found and reported to the Secretary of War that there is no suitable place on the island for the location of the prison, without interfering with the purposes for which the island has been set apart. I will read a part of this report, that the House may understand the reasons on which it is based. The commissioners say:

The board visited Rock Island, in the Mississippi River, with a view to the consideration of the question submitted in the letter of instructions. A topographical examination established the fact that there are but two points on the island where a sufficient drainage can be obtained, a want of the very first importance. One of these is at a point near the principal entrance to the armory grounds, lying in full view of the cities of Davenport, Iowa, and Rock Island City, Illinois, and between buildings already erected for the purposes of the armory.

As the safe-keeping of the prisoners would necessitate the inclosing of the prison buildings within a high wall, it is thought that their erection at this point would be a blemish to their surroundings. The other point is more remote, and is a desirable one for the purpose, should it be finally decided to select any part of the island.

The points above referred to are indicated on the map of Rock Island, herewith submitted, by numbered flags; the one first referred to being numbered 1 and the other 2.

As to the probable influence upon the interests of the armory, the board are of opinion that the erection of prison buildings on the island at all would be extremely detrimental, interfering, as it necessarily would, with the carrying out to fulfillment of the elaborate and comprehensive designs which have thus far governed in the work which has been carried forward there.

For instance, the point thought to be the only one at which a prison should, with due regard to good taste, be erected is the one, as will be seen by the map, where the plans for the completion of the armory, as originally adopted, contemplate the establishing of a foundery for heavy ordnance.

In the vicinity of Rock Island City, and on the high and desirable land near Rock River, a site can be purchased at from four to five hundred dollars per acre, and as twenty acres is thought to be all the ground necessary, the slight saving to be effected by the use of land on the island cannot be held of much weight against the attendant probable injury.

Although not called upon to offer any suggestions as to the advisability of selecting any other site than the one indicated in the act of March 3, 1873, the board, in view of the fact that the armory at Rock Island promises to answer for furnishment with material all the western portion of the country, would most respectfully suggest that the arsenal grounds at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, would be a far more eligible and convenient location for a prison than Rock Island, while the buildings, now of but little practical use to the Government, could be readily converted to prison uses.

Indeed, it is believed that for one-third of the sum which will be necessary to properly construct entirely new buildings those indicated may be made into buildings of a model character and surrounded by the requisite wall.

The cost of supporting the prisoners would be fully as small at Fort Leavenworth as at Rock Island, and it is believed that even should it not be considered proper to appropriate the arsenal grounds and buildings for the purpose, some other portion of the Government reservation at that point should be taken.

The Secretary of War, in transmitting this report to Congress, uses this language:

In regard to the island of Rock Island as a site, attention is particularly invited to the remarks of the board. On Rock Island, owned by the Government, there are but two sites where drainage, absolutely necessary, can be had. Either of these sites would materially interfere with and mar the plan for the armory. The idea of the location of the prison near the armory in order that the labor of its inmates might be utilized is not feasible. The most profitable labor of prisoners would be upon clothing, shoes, wagons, &c.; while the various branches of the armory work would have to be performed systematically by skilled artisans.

The military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, possesses every advantage possible over every other locality. The ground is already owned by the Government. It is the grand center of military transportation, from which rail communication radiates to all parts of the United States. It is a military post, and the necessary details for prison-guards, &c., can be made most conveniently at that point. In regard to economy in constructing and maintaining the prison, it certainly possesses superior advantages. In this connection attention is invited to a communication dated February 13, 1873, written before the passage of the act to establish a military prison, by Captain D. W. Flagler, commanding Rock Island arsenal, a copy of which is herewith.

I will now ask the Clerk to read the letter referred to by the Secretary of War.

The Clerk read as follows:

BOARD ON HEAVY-GUN CARRIAGES, ARMY BUILDING,
New York City, February 13, 1873.

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit for your consideration the following remarks relative to the establishment of a military prison at the Rock Island arsenal.

It is presumed that the reasons to be advanced for the establishment of a prison at so unusual a place as an arsenal would be—

First. That the labor of the prisoners might be applied to the work carried on at the arsenal.

Secondly. That the arsenal being situated on an island, the location might furnish safety from escape of prisoners.

Both of these reasons are fallacious, because—

1. The prisoners could not be employed on arsenal work. (a) Arsenal work is of such a character that it would be unsafe to intrust it to prisoners, or to any disaffected person. The experience of our last war has shown the danger of intrusting the production of material of war to any but thoroughly loyal and competent persons, devoted to the interests of the United States. It is extremely easy for an employé inclined to do so, to introduce imperfections into such material, and also at times to render such material—particularly ammunition—highly dangerous. (b) Even if it were safe to intrust the work to prisoners, they are incompetent. Arsenal work requires skilled workmen. Military prisoners would come to the work without skill; and the ordinary time of their incarceration would be insufficient for the acquirement of the necessary skill and experience, or for officers to ascertain whether they could be intrusted with work.

2. The island does not offer the supposed safety from escape. During the summer the shallow water along the Illinois shore offers little or no obstruction to the escape of a prisoner. During the remainder of the year there is a perfect bridge of ice around the whole island, and no obstruction to escape. A wall around the prison would be required, as in other localities.

Moreover, the arsenal would offer unusual and very great facilities for the escape of prisoners. When in active operations several thousand workmen will be employed in the arsenal. Unless a surveillance so strict as to interfere materially with the operations of the arsenal were employed, these workmen could connive easily and successfully at the escape of prisoners, especially if the prisoners were employed at work with the other employés.

The foregoing is only intended to show the fallacy of any known reasons for introducing a prison into an arsenal. But it is believed that the serious injury which such a course would inflict upon the arsenal would render insignificant in comparison any benefit that could accrue to the prison.

It is well known that Congress is building at Rock Island probably the greatest and finest arsenal in the world. It is a great national institution, upon which the whole country should look with pride; but it is built entirely for use, and is a main feature in our military system of defense, and we cannot consistently do anything that will diminish its safety and capacity for work, or its completeness and perfection. It was with a full understanding of the plans for the arsenal that Congress expended so much legislation and money to exclude every claimant from a foot-hold on the island, and set it aside exclusively for the great establishment that is now being built. The introduction of a prison into the arsenal is completely antagonistic to the plans of the Government for the place.

1. All the great bridges, avenues, and railroad built to the arsenal, are no more than sufficient to transact the business of the arsenal when in full operation, even when used to their best advantage. If these bridges and roads become avenues to a prison they would be obstructed to the full extent required for safety, and could not then transact the business of the arsenal; that is, for arsenal purposes we want them open to their full capacity for work, and for the admission of people on business, and workmen; for prison purposes we want them gated and guarded.

2. The most important element in an arsenal is safety. Nothing should be left undone which can add to its safety from accident, explosion, fire, or any other injury.

The introduction of a prison is deliberately introducing an element of danger. The prisoners must be looked upon as disaffected persons, probable enemies, and some of them—as shown by experience—are insane in their enmity, and the most dangerous of incendiaries.

3. Rock Island arsenal is to be a great national establishment, perfect in every respect. By introducing an antagonistic establishment, the arsenal becomes crippled, imperfect, and the plans of Congress are defeated.

I will cite, in conclusion, the history of the Washington arsenal. A penitentiary was located near it, but entirely outside the arsenal, and separated from it by a high wall. Even its proximity was deemed so dangerous that during the war the prisoners were removed, and the prison torn down and taken away. The objections to a prison even in the vicinity of the Rock Island arsenal are much greater, because of the character of the establishment.

If the matter were fully understood, it does not seem possible that Congress would appropriate money to build a prison within the arsenal.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. W. FLAGLER,
Captain of Ordnance, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel, U. S. A., Commanding Rock Island Arsenal, Illinois.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask the Clerk now to read the next letter in the report from Major Benét, of the Ordnance Department.

ORDNANCE OFFICE, February 14, 1873.

The Rock Island arsenal is intended to be a grand manufacturing establishment. When in operation, a portion of its manufactures will consist of dangerous explosives, requiring the utmost care in their manipulation.

Magazines stored with gunpowder and other explosives must necessarily constitute part of the arsenal; and it is submitted that none but reliable persons should be employed upon the island. It is not believed that the prisoners could be made use of to advantage except as laborers on the roads and grounds, and scattered, as they would necessarily be, over an island of one thousand acres, the guards for their supervision and care would have to be much larger than in an ordinary prison where they are confined within high walls.

The competition between convict and ordinary labor when brought in contact always leads to ill-feeling and irritation.

It is the opinion of this Bureau that the interests of the public service will be best subserved by having the prison establishment elsewhere than at the Rock Island arsenal.

By order of the Chief of Ordnance.

S. V. BENÉT,
Major of Ordnance.

Respectfully submitted to the Secretary of War.

A. B. DYER,
General, Chief of Ordnance, U. S. A.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I will state further, for the information of the House, that I called upon and had an interview with General Sherman in reference to this same subject, for the purpose of ascertaining his views. He is very decided in the expression of opinion that this military prison ought not to be located upon the island of Rock Island; that its location there would be entirely inconsistent with the purposes for which the island was set apart; that it cannot with any propriety be located upon that island as long as it is set apart for arsenal purposes. He also is clearly of opinion that it should go to Fort Leavenworth.

I am instructed by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Military Affairs to report this bill favorably and recommend its passage. Every member of that committee is of opinion, from the reports received not only from the commission appointed for the purpose of visiting Rock Island, but from Army officers whose opinions are entitled to weight, that Fort Leavenworth is the proper place to locate this military prison, and that the buildings already erected there will answer the purpose; and, as stated by the commission, the work can be done there for one-third of what it will cost anywhere else.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make this inquiry: Whether an appropriation has been made for the erection of a military prison at Rock Island; and if so, whether it is proposed to change those appropriations so that they may be used at Fort Leavenworth?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I will state, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] that no appropriation whatever has been made; that if he will turn to the bill of the last Congress he will see that no appropriation was made in that bill, and none has been made at any time for this purpose; and, so far as I know, not a dollar has been expended in connection with the establishment of this prison at Rock Island. The only persons who have visited Rock Island by authority are the three officers of the Army appointed by the Secretary of War. The portion of the committee appointed from civil life have not been at Rock Island at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill makes no appropriation?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. None whatever. The only effect of the passage of this bill is simply to provide that a military prison instead of being located at Rock Island shall be located at Fort Leavenworth.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to take this occasion to call the attention of the House for a moment to this bill, with a view to inquire whether we need build a military prison at all. I happen to know something of the origin of the proposition for a military prison. Some two years ago a number of officers were sent to examine the condition of military discipline in the British army in Canada. They found that the systems of military punishment were very different from those in this country, and they reported some reformatory measures, which were laid before the Secretary of War, and by him considerably modified and laid before Congress.

The result of that series of investigations was entirely different from what the original board of officers contemplated. It was not their idea at all that there should be a separate central military prison. But the modifications that their first suggestions received from the various persons through whose hands they went resulted, at last, in a bill passed without much debate to establish a military prison at Rock Island.

I wish to say that the officers who made the first investigation, and who made their report in the interest of humanity for the better government of the Army, and, if possible, to do away with some of the old barbarous methods of punishing soldiers, regard this central prison as a very bad institution, and earnestly request that it may never be built. I have in my desk, and have had for months—indeed I received it last session—a most earnest, and I may say eloquent, letter from one of the ablest officers of the Army, showing why Congress should not build a military prison for the imprisonment of soldiers. The same officer called our attention to the need of an amendment to the Army regulations, which I offered to the Army appropriation bill of last year, and which ended the barbarous practice of burning, branding, tattooing American citizens serving in the Army on their bodies, perhaps on their faces, and as a mark of disgrace and degradation.

Never until last year was it unlawful to thrust a branding-iron against the cheek of an American citizen, if a little court composed of half a dozen lieutenants saw fit to condemn a soldier to that punishment. And he might be thus branded for some trivial offense—an offense unknown to the civil courts, and which would never be punished anywhere else than in the Army. For a mere infraction of military regulations a soldier might thus be disfigured and disgraced for life. By an act passed last year such punishment was forbidden; and as a part of the process of abolishing cruel and disgraceful punishment, the prison commission of which I have spoken was sent to Canada. The result of their report was the law which now stands on our statute-book, and which I pray this House may take this occasion to repeal.

I am in favor of removing the military prison from Rock Island, as proposed by this bill; but I am also in favor of removing it from the face of the earth, of locating it nowhere. Fortunately no money has yet been appropriated for its construction, and I hope none will ever be made.

I now ask for a moment the attention of the House to the operation of the original law. Here is an officer in Oregon with a squad of soldiers, one of whom commits some offense—perhaps deserts—for which he is sentenced to one year's imprisonment. Another soldier in Florida commits an offense, for which he is condemned to be imprisoned; another in Maine, and another in Texas, subject themselves to similar punishment. Now what is to be done? When we shall have expended several hundred thousand dollars to build this prison, either at Fort Leavenworth or at Rock Island, a guard of troops is to be sent to convey these sentenced soldiers from Oregon, Florida, Maine, or Texas, carrying each of them more than a thousand miles, and deliver them at the military prison at Rock Island, or Fort Leavenworth, as the case may be; and then this guard of troops must travel back to their posts of duty. And when the term of imprisonment is served out, the soldier must of course be remanded to his regiment, must be taken back under guard and put upon duty—if a man disgraced by having served a term in the penitentiary can any longer be called a soldier of the Army of the United States.

No system so expensive for punishing soldiers was ever devised; nor could there be anything more degrading to the soldier, or better calculated to unfit him utterly for ever becoming a soldier again, than to transport him thousands of miles from his regiment, make him an inmate of a regular penitentiary for a series of years, and then transport him back again.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman will allow me to ask him whether he thinks it tends to elevate the moral tone of the Army to put a soldier in a State penitentiary?

Mr. GARFIELD. I say that whenever a soldier has committed any offense for which the legal punishment is confinement in the penitentiary, the civil courts will always take action in the case. Then the punishment by imprisonment in the penitentiary is appropriate, though a soldier thus condemned ought not afterwards to be restored to the Army. But for the punishment of mere infractions of military discipline, not amounting to felony, there ought to be no penitentiary. The punishment ought to be administered in the camp, under the control of the officers commanding the delinquent soldier, and should have in view the maintenance of military discipline and the restoration of the offender himself to his rank in the Army when his punishment shall have been completed.

A little over one year ago, happening to be in New York, I visited Governor's Island and some of our troops there. When the soldiers in the prison at that place were called out on dress parade, I stood there and witnessed fifteen men wearing the ball and chain on the leg, and in some cases the chain was so short that the soldier was obliged to stoop with his hand almost to his knee in order to hold the ball while on parade. At the request of the general commanding I had all those ball-and-chain men called to one side, and I ascertained the duration of the punishment to which they were sentenced and the crimes for which they were condemned. They had been sentenced to two, three, and four years' imprisonment, wearing ball and chain on the leg, for infractions of military law. Our military punishments in time of peace are now, in many cases, excessive; and if we establish a central military prison it will become the Army penitentiary for infractions of military duty. I do not believe, as a matter of good discipline for the Army or of economy for the Government, that this central prison ought to be established at all. I will vote to discontinue it at the location already authorized; but I will not vote to build it in any other place. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me, I will move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert a provision that "the act authorizing a military prison is hereby repealed."

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I now yield to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.]

Mr. COBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has a mistaken view of this whole matter, except as to the fact that he himself did last year introduce a humanitarian amendment to the law in relation to the branding of prisoners, after the passage of this act, if I am not mistaken—a little step which he magnifies now. The object of the law now under consideration is in the interest of humanity, and also in the interest of economy, on the most liberal and enlightened scale. Whatever may have been the origin of the law in the mind of some general of the Army, its true basis was a report of the Secretary of War, made during the last Congress, in which he expressly asked and insisted upon the establishment of a prison for the Army. For what reason? If members of the House will look at that report—No. 70 of Executive Documents of the last Congress—it will be seen, as there stated, that there is an immense number of military prisoners, the average of whose term of confinement runs over four years, and who are scattered throughout a large number of States, imprisoned with malefactors of the foulest character, and maintained at a very great expense.

The report of the Adjutant-General shows that the annual expense is over $75,000 for keeping these unfortunate men in the various State penitentiaries. They are in eleven States.

Let me call the attention of the House to the precise facts. There are in State penitentiaries: thirty-eight in Arkansas, fifteen in New York, five in California, thirty-three in Iowa, three in Kentucky, fifty-four in Kansas, one hundred and twenty in Louisiana, seventeen in Minnesota, thirty-two in Missouri, seven in Mississippi, and twenty-two in Texas; three hundred and forty-six in all, scattered throughout the land in these penitentiaries. Besides these there are three hundred and eighty-four general prisoners kept at thirty-two different military posts.

Now what is to be gained, in a moral point of view, by taking the prisoners who have been guilty only of some military delinquency, of some crime against the laws of the Army, involving perhaps no moral obliquity—what is to be gained by putting them in a State penitentiary, where none but felons, guilty of crimes of the blackest dye, are incarcerated? The very object of this law is to take men from prisons of that character, and the very thing the gentleman declaims against is now the system; that is, soldiers, for merely military offenses, are confined in places where the worst criminals are kept. In order to obviate that very thing in the interest of the Army, in the interest of the country and of humanity, this prison was provided, and for nothing else. Upon that ground it met favor in the House, and has the indorsement of the country. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] says it was not discussed here. I believe he did not participate in the debate. If there is no discussion in the House unless he takes part, perhaps it was not well discussed. But I tell that gentleman, and I tell the House, that every consideration of humanity and decency requires these soldiers, who are not criminals in the ordinary sense of the term, and who have been guilty only of infractions of the military law, should be taken out of these penitentiaries—scattered nurseries of vice throughout the United States; for in the very best of them we find it is the concurrent testimony that even now, with all the improved systems which have been adopted, men, in nine cases out of ten, come out of them worse than they went in.

Let us therefore, Mr. Speaker, have a place where the soldiers of the Army can go and be cared for kindly, under officers of the Army and under Army rules and discipline. As they are now scattered throughout the land they have no protection, no guardian, nobody who has any interest in them whatever. They are indeed orphan children of the Army, scattered far and wide in State prisons, subject to abuse and objects of cruel oppression, without a pitying eye or helping hand. The States take care of their prisoners; the United States do not. Let this system cease, with its barbarities.

In addition to those in State prisons, there is a large number of men, over three hundred and eighty, scattered throughout the various military posts in the country, subject to the caprices of petty tyrants, to abominable humiliations, and to the most outrageous cruelties.

The gentleman has said something about branding. No longer ago than last week I received a letter from a man confined in one of our forts. He writes to me that the practice there is to tie men up by the thumbs until the victims faint, and forcing them to carry weights until the belt that suspends the ball and chain has made the waist raw; and such barbarities are repeated and enforced in these military posts. The blood runs cold at their recital notwithstanding the little bill of the gentleman from Ohio. And outrages are committed upon prisoners which would harrow up the soul of anybody but a wolf. These things are occurring, and they call loudly for redress. Now, we must take care of these men; and in the name of decency and humanity we ask the House to take a step of progress now and stand by this prison.

It was expected to establish it at Rock Island, where the prisoners would be able to aid in the construction or repair, or whatever was to be done, in the arsenal. Army officers have reported against it on account of the expense, of inconvenience, and of a better location. We provide, therefore, that it shall go to Fort Leavenworth, where there is a large reservation, a healthy situation, and a central point. There are large stone buildings there which can be utilized at very little expense to the Government. We are told that at Rock Island it would cost $500,000 to construct this prison, but if taken to Fort Leavenworth but little expenditure would establish such an institution as we could point to as a monument of the good sense and decency and humanity of those who manage the Army and those who guide national affairs. The Secretary of War and military men of the highest humane impulses are all in favor of it. I have heard nowhere, except here and from the mouth of one general officer of the Army, any protest against this prison. Sir, the House will be traveling back toward barbarism instead of going forward on the path of progress if they abolish this great advance step in the direction of humane management of military prisoners.

Mr. POTTER. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for five minutes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the gentleman from Indiana propose that all military prisoners scattered throughout the United States shall be sent to this military prison?

Mr. COBURN. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. Has the gentleman made any estimate of what the cost will be in transporting all military prisoners to this prison?

Mr. COBURN. It will not cost any more than to take them to the penitentiaries where they are now taken and confined; in fact, not nearly so much. The Government now pays for boarding, and employs the officers of State prisons to guard, care for, and superintend the prisoners, besides feeding and clothing them. But if the United States has its own prison it gets the benefit of the convict labor. The Army officers are the prison officers; the guards are soldiers, and the clothing and rations of the Army are furnished; this is a great saving.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the gentleman propose to have transported to this prison all those who may be guilty of mere trivial military offenses?

Mr. COBURN. Those that are guilty of mere slight offenses will be punished at their posts. It is not expected to have the entire discipline of the Army confined to this prison. Only those convicted of graver military offenses will go there.

Mr. POTTER. I ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] to yield to me.

Mr. COBURN. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEWITT] for a question.

Mr. DEWITT. Will the building of this prison stop the practice of officers of the Army tying up men by the thumbs?

Mr. COBURN. The board of commissioners, all of them humane gentlemen, composed of three gentlemen in civil life and three officers of the Army, noted for their humanity and common sense, have adopted a code of rules, under and by virtue of the law passed last winter, which provides that the most humane treatment of prisoners possible shall be the system adopted in this military prison.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. The law itself makes that provision.

Mr. COBURN. Yes, sir; I say that these commissioners have adopted a code of rules in pursuance of the law itself, which provides that the prisoners shall be treated with a view to reformation and an eye to humanity. They provide that the prison barbarities shall be expressly prohibited and abolished, barbarities which have been continued too long, to the disgrace of the Army and the disgrace of the nation, in the eyes of all men who have a regard to humanity.

Mr. POTTER. I was glad to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in regard to the establishment of this military prison. From all I can learn it ought never to have been authorized at all; and I agree that the best thing the House can now do is to repeal the law authorizing it. I happened last summer to be in the company of a very distinguished officer of the Army—not, I think, one of those to whom my friend from Ohio alluded, but a gentleman distinguished as well for his high military standing as for his humane private character—and the views he expressed tallied exactly with the views of the officers to whom the gentleman from Ohio alluded.

It seems to me that the offenses of soldiers which, as the gentleman from Ohio put it, are in the nature of offenses against the civil laws, and crimes in themselves, ought to be punished by sending the offenders to the prison of the locality where the crime is committed, wherever that may be, and he himself debarred from returning to the Army. If he commits any high crime for which he should be imprisoned in a penitentiary for a long period, his time of service will be well spent when his term of imprisonment has expired; and a man convicted of a grave crime ought not then to be received back into the Army.

But as regards the other class of offenses—offenses against military rule and military discipline, offenses malum prohibitum only—nothing, as it seems to me and as my informant assured me, can be worse for the soldier than to take him, when guilty of mere breach of military rules and regulations, and transfer him as a criminal hundreds or thousands of miles across the country, there to put him into a regular prison. The mere transit across the country for imprisonment would put a stigma on him, and his character be injuriously affected by his being treated as a common criminal.

Mr. COBURN. This will not imprison one more man than is now put in the penitentiary.

Mr. POTTER. Then the provisions for imprisoning soldiers were well enough as they were.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] says that the Secretary of War recommended this prison at Rock Island a year ago. But, sir, it is the same Secretary of War who recommended that the prison should be established at Rock Island who now wants it removed several hundreds of miles west to Fort Leavenworth. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] says this prison is intended to protect soldiers against barbarity, and that in the bill to establish this prison it is provided that there shall be a code of rules for their humane government. Surely it is not necessary to build a great Federal military prison to get rid of barbarity. Let us rather supply a proper code of rules for the Army everywhere, and not limited to this prison at Fort Leavenworth. The truth is, that whatever abuses there may have been in the treatment of soldiers in the Army, the remedy for such abuses should be applied to the treatment of our soldiers everywhere. But to go to the expense of erecting a great military prison in which to confine—as the chairman of the Military Committee now says—men guilty of crimes for which they would otherwise be confined in local penitentiaries, is to set on foot an enormous expenditure of money, of no possible good to the Army, to the prisoners, or to the country. Therefore I trust the gentleman from Ohio will persist in his amendment repealing the original act authorizing this prison.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. COBURN. Before my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, proceeds, I wish to say that the report of the Adjutant-General last year shows that we paid $75,115 per annum for the board of the prisoners that we have now—more than enough to repair all these buildings at Fort Leavenworth, and make a good prison out of them, without a dollar's additional expense.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to say to the House that the bill now pending is simply for one purpose, to change the locality of this prison. It was provided, by the law passed last session without any opposition whatever, that this prison should be established, and that certain rules should be adopted for its government.

Now the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I have no doubt, was present here when this bill was considered last March. I remember very well its introduction by the Military Committee at that time. I was not then a member of the committee. It was reported, as I understood, by the Military Committee, providing that the prison be located at Rock Island, because the Government owned the land there. There was no difficulty then, as I understood it, as to the propriety of having such a prison. I hear this morning, for the first time, anybody claiming, here or elsewhere, that a military prison ought not to be established for the use of the Army.

Although I have had nothing to do with this previous legislation, yet with the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. COBURN,] and other gentlemen who have been members of that committee, I can see good reasons why the law of the last session should not be repealed. In the first place, I believe that men who are convicted for offenses of a military character only, ought not to be imprisoned with those who are sent to the penitentiary charged with murder, robbery, and other heinous crimes known to the law. I hold that these men in the Army should not be imprisoned with the scoundrels who have been convicted and sent to State penitentiaries. I believe, further, that there is nothing that to-day tends to deplete our Army by desertion so much as the confinement of soldiers in State penitentiaries, where they are degraded both as men and as soldiers.

It is claimed that this system will be much more expensive than the system of confining soldiers in State penitentiaries. I deny that it will be so much more expensive. It is proposed to locate this prison at Fort Leavenworth, because, as is said by these officers, it is cheaper to locate the prison there, where it will be nearer the central point of the military operations of the Army. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will not deny that that is a more central point of the operations of the Army. These buildings now erected at Fort Leavenworth, as this report shows, can be used for this purpose at a cost of one-third what the buildings can be constructed for anywhere else.

In answer to the objection made on account of the cost of transportation, I will say this: we send prisoners from all parts of the country to the penitentiary at Albany. We send from this District to Albany every man convicted of crime and sentenced to the penitentiary. We propose to locate this military prison at a central point, where it can be easily reached; where the building can be cheaply erected and cheaply managed, and where the Army shall have for itself a place to confine Army prisoners and offenders. I ask the gentleman from Ohio why he should not apply the same argument to the Insane Asylum over there on the hill. There is located an asylum for the insane of the Army. Why not put them in the State asylums? Why construct a magnificent building here in which shall be confined the men of the Army who have been so unfortunate as to become insane? Why bring them from all parts of the country to be confined here? Why not put them in the State asylums?

Mr. GARFIELD. Does not the gentleman make any difference between an insane man and a convict?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The difference is wide. You might take a man from the Army and put him in a State insane asylum, and he would not be degraded by being confined there with other men. But when you take a man from the Army and put him in a State penitentiary with a man from your district, for instance, who has committed arson, robbery, or any heinous crime known to the law, you have degraded a soldier of the Army of the United States by confining him in a penitentiary with common criminals, when he ought not to have been so confined—when he may not have committed a penitentiary offense.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then he should not be sent there.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman says he should not be sent there. He must be confined somewhere.

Mr. GARFIELD. Send him to the guard-house.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. He will still be sent to the guard-house for such offenses as deserve that character of punishment. But if this military prison shall be erected for such offenses as you now send him to the penitentiary, he will be confined in this military prison. I think this legislation has the support of every officer of the Army here. The Secretary of War recommends it earnestly. General Sherman, the Adjutant-General of the Army, and other officers with whom I have conversed with regard to it, deem it important that there should be a place for the confinement of soldiers of the Army of the United States.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I would like to know if the Committee on Military Affairs have made any estimate of the cost of the transportation of these men to Fort Leavenworth?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I have stated already that I had nothing to do with the preparation of the original bill on this subject; I was not then a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. But the bill was carefully considered at that time, and Congress then, I believe without any opposition at all, passed the bill for the establishment of a military prison.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Have the committee made any estimate of the cost of supporting these prisoners after the prison has been built?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It seems to me that this whole question has been forced upon the House at this time without any need of it. No proposition is brought forward here to build a prison, for it has already been directed by Congress. The committee had no idea that this question would be raised in the proposition simply to change the location. There was no reason why the committee should come here this morning prepared with figures to show that a military prison was necessary, when Congress only at the last session had declared it was necessary and passed a bill to establish it. I call the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to submit a substitute for this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] did not yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. Should the call for the previous question be voted down, would such a motion be in order?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HAWLEY of Illinois, and Mr. HOLMAN, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered; which was on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 78, noes not counted.

Mr. MELLISH. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ISIDORE DOIGLE AND ROSA DOIGLE WOODRUFF.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House yesterday adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the southern claims commission be directed to send to the House of Representatives the petition, proofs, and papers relating to the claim of Isidore Doigle and Rosa Doigle Woodruff, of the State of Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, was presented by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries.

PRINTING THE LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House seven hundred extra copies of the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875.

ARKANSAS ELECTION CONTEST—GUNTER VS. WILSHIRE.

Mr. THOMAS. I rise to a question of privilege, and call up the contested-election case from the third congressional district of the State of Arkansas. I ask that the resolution reported by the majority of the committee be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That W. W. Wilshire is entitled prima facie to a seat in the Forty-third Congress as Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Arkansas, without prejudice to the right of Thomas M. Gunter, claiming to have been elected thereto, to contest his right to said seat upon the merits.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the argument of this case, I think it desirable to have an understanding in reference to the time which shall be occupied in the discussion and how it shall be divided.

Mr. LAMAR. I desire that the resolution reported by the minority of the committee, and which I desire to offer as a substitute for the resolution of the majority, be now read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the contested-election case from the third district of Arkansas be recommitted to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report, upon the merits of the case, who is entitled to represent said district in this House.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is pending as an amendment to the resolution reported by the committee. The gentleman who calls up the case desires some understanding as to the time to be occupied and how it shall be divided.

Mr. LAMAR. I do not think that on the side of the minority we shall want more than an hour.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the gentleman mean that one hour shall be occupied by the committee in debate after the previous question has been demanded and seconded?

Mr. LAMAR. I ask for an hour after the seconding of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] was probably not apprehended by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] The purport of it was whether there should be an hour on each side before the previous question, and that the hour afterward should belong to the committee.

Mr. LAMAR. I accept the proposition that there shall be an hour and a half allowed for debate on each side. Upon that understanding I suppose the minority would be entitled to half the time after the seconding of the previous question. Is that the proposition?

Mr. THOMAS. I would suggest that the two hours preceding the call of the previous question be divided; and then, as there are other gentlemen who desire to speak, but not at length, I am willing to farm out part of my hour, and the gentleman can farm out his as he chooses. I make this suggestion because it is in accordance with what was suggested to me privately by the gentleman himself.

Mr. SPEER. Is it understood that the debate shall close at the time the previous question is demanded; that two hours shall be occupied in debate before the previous question is called, and that afterward there shall be no further debate?

Mr. THOMAS. I am not able, in justice to this case, to agree to that; but I will not decline to offer any portion of the hour to which

I may be entitled after the seconding the previous question to gentlemen of the opposition to debate the minority report.

The SPEAKER. As the question cannot probably be settled by unanimous consent, the debate had better proceed. The Chair will now recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] as entitled to one hour; he will then recognize the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] as entitled to an hour. At the expiration of two hours the sense of the House can be tested upon seconding the previous question. The rules provide ample scope for that.

Mr. THOMAS. That arrangement is satisfactory to me. I have no disposition to detain the House except for a brief period. I think fifteen or twenty minutes will be sufficient to enable me to present this case fairly. This is a prima facie case of election. It was referred to the committee on the 2d of December last by a resolution which seemed to make it imperatively the duty of the committee to report upon it as a prima facie case. I ask the attention of the House to the distinction between this case and the contested-election case pending before the committee. In the language of the resolution certain credentials and papers were referred to the committee, and to those credentials and papers the committee deemed themselves restricted. Just here I wish to say that the minority of the committee, in endeavoring to establish the prima facie right of Mr. Gunter to the seat, have introduced testimony entirely irrelevant, if that be a proper word to use in a public inquiry of the nature of the one before the House—testimony entirely irrelevant to a prima facie case.

In order to establish the prima facie right of Mr. Wilshire, I rely entirely upon the certificate of Governor Baxter, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Abstract of the returns of the election held in the third congressional district of the State of Arkansas on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1872, for Representative in Congress, showing the vote.

Scattered votes polled for "Guntee," "S. M. Gunter," "T. M. Guntee," "Thos. M. Guntee," "T. Ros Gunter," and "Thomas M. Crenter," in Pulaski County, 1,456.

Boone County has not been made a part of the third congressional district by any act of the Legislature.

The votes given to "Gunther" from Montgomery and Newton Counties were probably intended for Thomas M. Gunter.

The scattering vote in Pulaski County given to "Wilshire," "Guntee," "S. M. Gunter," "T. M. Guntee," "Thos. M. Guntee," "T. Ros Gunter," and "Thos. M. Crenter," is a literal copy of the clerk's returns.

A certificate of the clerk is appended to the returns from Washington County, questioning the validity of the election in Richland township. If this objection is allowed, the vote will stand: For Wilshire 686, and Gunter 1,125.

Sarber County has not been made a part of the third congressional district by any act of the Legislature.

There are no returns from the clerk of Scott County.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, Executive Office:

Whereas the acting governor failed to issue a certificate of election to the person who received the highest number of votes for Representative in Congress from the third congressional district of Arkansas, at the election held in said district on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1872; and whereas, on the 14th day of February, A. D. 1873, the secretary of state, in my presence, did cast up the votes polled for said Representative at said election from the returns on file in his office:

Now, therefore, I, Elisha Baxter, governor of the State of Arkansas, do certify that the foregoing statement, with the explanatory notes, is a full, true, and correct exhibit of the votes polled for Representative from the third congressional district of Arkansas, at the election held in said district on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1872, as appears from the returns of said election on file and certificates of clerks deposited in the office of secretary of state.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the State to be affixed, at Little Rock, on this 18th day of February, A. D. 1873.

[L. S.] ELISHA BAXTER,
Governor.

By the Governor:
J. M. JOHNSON, Secretary of State.

Mr. THOMAS. I will now ask the Clerk to read section 50 of the laws of Arkansas. I purpose to show that the certificate is in form, and in accordance with the laws of Arkansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 50. It shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, within thirty days after the time herein allowed, to make returns of elections to the clerks of the county courts, or sooner if all the returns shall have been received, to cast up and arrange the votes from the several counties, or such of them as have made returns, for such persons voted for as members of Congress; and the governor shall immediately thereafter issue his proclamation declaring the person having the highest number of votes to be duly elected to represent the State in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and shall grant a certificate thereupon under the seal of the State to the person so elected.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, Mr. Speaker, during the history of election cases, a certificate in that form has been considered to be in due form, and a memorial or certificate in such form, furnishing evidence of prima facie right, from the earliest history of election cases has been deemed satisfactory. It has been held to be such evidence as would, when addressed to the fair sense of right and the conscientious discretion of members, influence them to vote for seating the person in whose case it was produced.

Now, let me say, this is not a case at law between Wilshire and Gunter. It does not present a case between the people of the third congressional district of Arkansas and any other party. It is a great parliamentary inquiry which this House is conducting by virtue of its constitutional power—"each House is the judge of the qualifications, returns, and elections of its own members." In such an inquiry the House is not absolutely bound by any statute, even by the statute of Congress. Such a national statute can only operate in the nature of a rule. It has always respected such statutes, and it has further resorted to the laws of the States and respected them in contested-election cases without being absolutely bound by them.

Prior to the 9th of February, 1851, there was no national law regulating the subject of contested-election cases. Reference therefore was had to the laws of the several States; and to-day there is no law regulating a prima facie case of election, except what is found in the law making it the duty of the Clerk of the House of Representatives to place on the roll of the House the names of members from States which before that had been represented, and the names of such only. The language I particularly desire to quote is this: "And of such persons only, and whose credentials show they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively." The House has always looked to the laws of the State where there were any provisions in the laws in relation to evidence, to ascertain whether credentials were in due form, and whether a member was elected prima facie in accordance with them. Section 50 of the laws of Arkansas shows that in this case it was the duty of the secretary of state to cast up and arrange the votes from the several counties, or such of them as had made returns, and to do so in the presence of the governor. The then acting governor, O. A. Hadley, went out of office, having failed to make proclamation and issue certificate as provided by this section. Governor Baxter succeeded him, and deemed it his duty and right to make the proclamation and issue the certificate. It is said this power to make the proclamation and issue certificate ceased when Governor Hadley went out of office; but I submit to the lawyers of this House whether this statute is not merely directory, and assuming that it might not be so held in the courts of the State, whether this House, passing upon its construction in this great public inquiry, ought not to hold it to be directory. Sir, it should not be said, because the phrase "in presence of the governor" is used and Governor Hadley went out of office, that therefore, his successor not being present, the governor cannot issue the certificate and make the proclamation. Such construction would or might defeat the right to representation of the people of the State, as well as the rights of parties who claim to have been elected. I do not suppose that the statute would be interpreted to mean that the secretary of state should cast up and arrange the votes in the governor's actual presence. I suppose if the governor had been in the office of the secretary of state, and had turned his back while the secretary was casting up and arranging the votes, smoking his cigar and in conversation with his friends, it would not be held to invalidate the result of the secretary's action; and had the acting governor resigned or died an hour afterward, Governor Baxter would have had power to issue the proclamation and certificate.

The objection has been made that the certificate was not in due form. The minority, in expressing their views to this House, seem to rely enterely upon that objection, that it was not in due form. In the case which was decided in this House during the last Congress, Giddings vs. Clark, and decided entirely upon the evidence afforded by the certificate issued by the governor of Texas, which I will not trouble the House with reading, the governor had certified that Clark was duly elected; but he went on to say in the certificate expressly that he had evidence that so many frauds had been committed in that district, that were he not compelled by the law of May 31, 1870, he would not declare the result of the election, and he would say that the election ought to be remanded to the people. And yet the committee in that case recommended to this House that Mr. Clark was entitled prima facie to his seat. The House did seat him, and afterward Mr. Giddings, the contestant, on the merits of the contested case, was admitted to his seat.

Sir, that may be so here. The majority of the committee did not undertake to report the case upon its merits, as the minority seem to have done. I do not know whether upon the hearing of the pending contest Mr. Wilshire will be deemed entitled to his seat or not, nor do the majority say so. I repeat, the minority had no right to bring in the testimony which they have brought in in the minority report, testimony outside of that to which we were restricted.

If the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] will take the same liberal view of this case which he did the other day of the case of Hodges vs. Ganse, he will see we were restricted in the evidence in this as in that case, and come to the conclusion now to which he did come in committee, that Mr. Wilshire was entitled prima facie to the seat.

As I am not speaking in any regular order, the gentleman will pardon me for reading at this stage his own language in this case:

Whilst the majority of the committee are of the opinion that, upon the evidence to which they are legally restricted, Mr. W. W. Wilshire is prima facie entitled to be admitted as the sitting member of this House, pending the contest, yet the doubts arising from that evidence, in relation to his election, are so grave, that the committee asks the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections are restricted to investigate and determine the said case on its merits, and report the result to this House.

From this resolution—the same as that which has been offered as an amendment—it was understood that the gentleman from Mississippi believed that Mr. Wilshire was entitled to the prima facie seat.

Mr. LAMAR. I do not exactly understand what the gentleman read just now. What was the document which he read?

Mr. THOMAS. I understood that the gentleman himself had admitted that Mr. Wilshire was entitled prima facie to his seat; but held at the same time that there were such grave doubts in regard to his election, doubts suggested by the evidence, which was pertinent or relevant only to the pending contested case, that he would recommend that the contested case be decided first.

Mr. LAMAR. Did you say Mr. Wilshire?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. THOMAS. I send to the gentleman his resolution in his own handwriting, and will say that I have not been able to draw a distinction, and I should be happy to see the minority draw a distinction between this case and the case already decided of Ganse vs. Hodges. The same certificate of the secretary of state, the same proclamation, and the same form of certificate of Governor Baxter, were referred to the committee in both cases. The whole difficulty with the minority has arisen from the fact that they have gone into testimony which belongs to the contested case, and not confined themselves to the testimony to which they were restricted by the resolution of the House.

As to the form of the certificate, let me call the attention of the House to the celebrated case of Foster vs. Covode, of Pennsylvania. Under the law of that State it was the duty of the governor to issue his proclamation of election upon the returns of the officers authorized by law to make them. The governor did issue his proclamation.

Mr. LAMAR. I wish to make an explanation in reference to this resolution offered by myself in the committee. The facts connected with the resolution are these: The gentleman who thought Mr. Wilshire entitled to the prima facie seat was not willing to seat him upon that evidence, because he said there was a moral certainty in his mind, or at least a moral conviction, that the merits were against him. Several of us attempted to draft a resolution embodying that view; among others myself. My own opinion was, and I expressed it in the committee over and over again, that this did not give Mr. Wilshire the prima facie right. The gentleman from North Carolina is at fault in his recollection of what occurred in the committee-room. This is in my handwriting, but I was simply transcribing and embodying the view of another gentleman whose view was contrary to my own. We were simply seeking to harmonize different views in one resolution. It recited that a majority of the committee were of the opinion that Mr. Wilshire had the prima facie right, which excluded the inference that all of the committee were of that opinion.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not wish to present that as the view of the gentleman from Mississippi if it was the view of another. All I have now to say is, it was the correct view. And let me say it was the correct view, for this reason, that the committee were restricted as to evidence, and could not go into that evidence referred to them in the pending contest; and no gentleman of that committee could be influenced by any view of the case which he might have from having looked into the evidence relating to the pending contest. In the case of Clark vs. Giddings, I believe the majority of the Committee on Elections thought Clark could be unseated after he had been admitted to a prima facie seat and had been sworn in. And it turned out that he was afterward unseated.

Perhaps I am about to speak hastily, but I will say that I think, if I knew now to-day that Wilshire would upon the hearing of his contested-election case be declared not elected to the seat, still it would be the duty of the Committee on Elections to report this resolution, and the duty of the House to admit him to a seat, until the question of fact is ascertained in the mode pointed out in the statute, and the case decided upon its merits. The committee have nothing then to do with that view of it; that is a matter to come up hereafter.

The question involved in this case is a great question, relating not only to the organization of this House, but to the right of representation of the people of a State; not merely to the rights of these parties, nor to the rights of the constituents of a particular district, but in some sort to the right of the people of Arkansas, and the right of the whole American people, under the Constitution, which has given us the power to judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of members, with a view to the constitution of the national Legislature.

Now let me go back to what I was about to cite, to show that this certificate is in true form, or in form, (words which I do not consider material,) to the case of Foster against Covode. In that case the governor had issued a proclamation as to which the committee say it is a blank in reference to the twenty-first district, and they did not consider it. Subsequently the governor wrote a short private letter, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENNSYLVANIA EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania, February 23, 1869.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith additional affidavits and evidences of fraud submitted to me in regard to the election of member of Congress in the twenty-first congressional district of this State. These affidavits were taken before officers properly authorized to administer oaths, and indicate the election of Hon. John Covode.

Most respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN W. GEARY,
Governor of Pennsylvania.

Hon. EDWARD MCPHERSON,
Clerk House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. THOMAS. I call attention of the House to the fact that this is a mere private letter from the governor of Pennsylvania to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, not under the broad seal of the State, having no wording to show that it is a certificate, not using even the word "show"—and I take it there is some difference between that word and the word "indicate"—simply transmitting evidences of fraud. In this private letter he says that these affidavits indicate that the Hon. John Covode was elected. The Committee on Elections held that that supplemented the proclamation, and was intended to show the decision of the governor's mind that Mr. Covode had been elected, and the House so decided.

Mr. LAMAR. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman is mistaken; he is laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. THOMAS. Upon what point?

Mr. LAMAR. The House did not decide that Mr. Covode had the prima facie right to a seat, but adopted a resolution similar to that which the minority of this committee have now reported. In drawing up this resolution, I tried to make it an exact copy of the one which this House passed in the very case from which the gentleman is quoting. That case was one in which it was proposed to seat Mr. Covode upon the credentials of the governor; and on account of the irregularity of those credentials the House overruled the action of the majority of the Committee on Elections, and remanded the case back for their investigation and determination of the question upon its merits. The history of that case is directly the opposite of what the gentleman says. I have copied the precise resolution which the House then adopted, the resolution reported by the minority of the committee in that case.

Mr. THOMAS. I will read from the syllabus of the case:

Neither party held the governor's certificate; but ex parte affidavits, alleging frauds in behalf of Foster, were sent to the House by the governor. It was held that, under the instructions of the House, Covode had the prima facie title to the seat.

Mr. LAMAR. "Held" by the committee; but the holding of the committee was overruled by the House, and the whole case was referred back to the committee to examine and determine upon its merits. The committee adopted the resolution which I, as one of the minority in this case, have reported to the House. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] is here and can verify my statement.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That is my recollection.

Mr. LAMAR. My recollection is distinct as to the correctness of my statement.

Mr. THOMAS. I will not detain the House as to the correctness of my statement. I may have been misled by the syllabus. I think not, however. But I have introduced this letter to show that no particular form of certificate has ever been required by this House. And I do not think any form should be required or adhered to even if a particular form had been required by State law. It is said that this is not a certificate to either one of the parties claiming to be elected, but that it is a mere abstract or statement of the vote polled, and was given to both parties, as it would have been given to anybody who might choose to call upon the governor of the State for it.

Upon the very face of the certificate the governor states that, as the acting governor had failed to issue a certificate, for that reason he (the governor) certifies "that the foregoing statement with the explanatory notes" is a "full, true, and correct exhibit of the votes polled for the Representative from the third congressional district of Arkansas." This certificate, as it is called by the governor himself, shows upon its face that Mr. Wilshire received a majority of 1,195 votes. The footnotes, or "explanatory notes," as the governor calls them, are no part of the certificate. They show that the scattering votes were cast for "Guntee," "S. M. Gunter," "T. M. Guntee," "Thos. M. Guntee," "T. Ros Gunter," and "Thos. M. Crenter." If it be assumed on the part of the minority of the committee that these votes were intended as a matter of fact to be cast for Thomas M. Gunter, I reply that this can only be determined upon the contest. Other evidence is needed to establish that conclusion; and that evidence was not before the committee, and is not before the House.

Suppose the governor of a State, in conformity with the State law directing him to issue a certificate, were to say simply that A B received at a certain election, held in a certain district, 5,000 votes, and that C D received 1,000 votes, and should append to this statement the seal of the State and his official signature. Would any gentleman in this House, whether a judicially minded gentleman, to use the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] or a party-minded gentleman, or any other-minded gentleman, say that that was not sufficient, when it appeared mathematically to the House that one of the parties received a majority of 4,000 votes? Sir, I think it would not be held here that any additional words, such as "duly elected," "elected," or "therefore elected," would be required; it would be presumed to have been intended by the governor as the decision of his mind that the person securing the majority of votes was elected; it would show conclusively to the House that he had been elected, and it would be held sufficient evidence to establish the prima facie right.

I wish to call the attention of the minority of the committee to a statement embraced in their report, which I think has either been made through inadvertence or is a misprint. In giving a copy of the certificate of the clerk of the county court of Pulaski County they name, as persons receiving votes, Thomas M. Gunter, 1,621; then again, in another column, Thomas M. Gunter, 343; then, in still another column, Thomas M. Gunter, 50 votes; and, in another column, Thomas M. Gunter, 506 votes. Now is it to be supposed that the clerk of that county, in making up his abstract, would have put in separate columns votes for the same person, Thomas M. Gunter? The mistake either arose at the Public Printing Office, or from inadvertence on the part of the minority of the committee. All the votes for Thomas M. Gunter would of course properly be put in one column, as all the votes for W. W. Wilshire are. I presume the name intended to appear in some of these columns was "Thos. M. Guntee," or some other name which appears in the certificates of the original votes in the office of the secretary of state.

As I have already made allusion to a phrase which was used the other day in the West Virginia cases by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] allow me to say that I do not regard this as a case requiring for its decision "judicial-minded gentlemen," and certainly not party-minded gentlemen. I do not profess in this case to belong either to those who stand up straight or to those who lean to one side or the other. Sir, there is another class of gentlemen—honest-minded gentlemen—who are good judges in matters of public inquiry like this. There is a quality of mind of highest importance, and that quality is integrity. I have said upon good authority that all that is required in deciding upon a case of this sort is a fair sense of right and conscientious discretion, and these involve what I have spoken of as integrity—not that sort of integrity which discharges the ordinary obligations of life between man and man, but that sort of integrity which produces an inclination in the mind to turn ever to the truth as the magnetic needle turns always to the pole. This is the sort of integrity which is essential to make a lawyer, or a judge, or a statesman.

Without attempting to evoke any party feeling, if it were possible to do so in this case, I can fairly say that, in my opinion, this is as clear a case of prima facie right to a seat as has been presented to this House for years. The action we propose is fully justified by precedents. If the House should adopt the view of the majority, that it is the duty of the House upon the highest reasons which respect the right of representation of the people of the States, reasons which look to its own more complete organization, and it might be, in some cases, to its original organization, to admit a man first to his seat before the contest upon the merits has been decided, then I am satisfied the House will adopt the resolution reported by the majority of the committee.

I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRISON.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall require even fifteen minutes to present to the House the views which I desire to submit in order to assist the House in coming to a correct conclusion upon this case. I am thoroughly satisfied that beyond doubt the intention of the House in referring this matter to the committee was with the view of having a decision as to who was entitled to be sworn in as the sitting member; in other words, to have the judgment of the committee as to which of the contestants was entitled prima facie to the seat. I presume there can be as little doubt as to the propriety of the policy which the House has adopted heretofore—the propriety of acting in pursuance of that great principle which looks to representation upon the floor of this House from every section of the country. I presume there can be no sort of doubt about the propriety of the course which the House has heretofore adopted in every proper case of deciding as soon as practicable who is entitled prima facie to the right to a seat upon this floor, notwithstanding the House may afterward come to a different conclusion on the question as to who is entitled to the seat upon an investigation of the question on its merits.

Now, sir, the resolution adopted by the House, which submitted this case to the Committee on Elections, is as follows:

Resolved, That the credentials and papers, in possession of the Clerk of the House, in the cases of contested elections from the first and third districts of Arkansas, be referred to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report at the earliest day practicable, who of the contesting parties are entitled to be sworn in as sitting members of this House.

I say there can be no reason for the conclusion that it was intended the Committee on Elections should go into the question of who was entitled to the seat on the merits, and examine the lengthy record in this case with the view of determining that question. The only reason why the credentials and papers in the possession of the Clerk of the House in this case were submitted to the committee without seating one or the other of the contestants, was that these credentials were somewhat peculiar. There was no certificate or proclamation by the governor of the State of Arkansas, reciting in so many words that Mr. Wilshire or Mr. Gunter had been duly elected. There had been under section 50, of the act of 1868, passed by the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, an arranging and casting up of votes by the secretary of state in the presence of the governor. That section of the act of the Legislature is as follows:

SEC. 50. It shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, within thirty days after the time herein allowed to make returns of elections to the clerks of the county courts, or sooner, if all the returns shall have been received, to cast up and arrange the votes from the several counties, or such of them as have made returns, for such persons voted for as members of Congress; and the governor shall immediately thereafter issue his proclamation, declaring the person having the highest number of votes to be duly elected to represent the State in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and shall grant a certificate thereof, under the seal of the State, to the person so elected.

Instead of the governor of Arkansas having issued a certificate of election or having issued a proclamation reciting in so many words that either one of the claimants was duly elected, which would have been a literal compliance with the fiftieth section of the act of 1868, he proclaimed the result of the arranging and casting up by the secretary of state of all the returns from the different counties in the third congressional district. This table or abstract of the votes thus cast up and arranged shows upon its face that W. W. Wilshire had a majority of the votes cast, unless it may be contended that the number of votes recited in that table as "scattering" should be put down for one or the other of these contestants. Will any gentleman contend that, taking this table or abstract which shows a majority of the votes cast to have been cast for Mr. Wilshire unless the scattering votes are counted at a venture, it does not in substance and effect show W. W. Wilshire is elected from the third congressional district of the State of Arkansas? And will any gentleman contend that the committee of this House, upon such investigation as has been made by the committee and upon the question as now presented to the House, can presume to say that a single one of these scattering votes was cast for either one or the other of these contestants?

It will be seen by reference to this abstract of the votes, cast up and arranged by the secretary of state, that taking the number of votes put down as having been polled for "Gunther," as set forth on page 3 of the committee's report, and giving Mr. Gunter the full benefit of the votes shown on the face of the abstract to have been polled for "Gunther," it still leaves Mr. Gunter in the minority and gives Mr. Wilshire a majority of the votes cast. I repeat, unless this House comes to the conclusion that in a prima facie case they can take into account these scattering votes for one of these claimants, it must come to the conclusion that Mr. Wilshire received a majority of the votes and is prima facie entitled to the seat. It is shown on the face of this abstract that he received a majority of the votes and is entitled to a seat on this floor until a decision of the case on its merits is had.

Mr. Speaker, that is about all I have to say. When I came to the conclusion that the House intended by this resolution to submit to the committee the prima facie case, I had no sort of doubt or difficulty about the duty of the committee. I have now no sort of doubt or difficulty as to the duty of this House. It is important that the third district of the State of Arkansas should be represented on this floor pending the investigation of the merits. Although there are cases in the history of contested elections before this House where parties have been seated upon what was apparently a prima facie right to the seat and been afterwards ejected, having had to give way to the successful competitor in the case upon its merits, yet it does not change the wisdom of the policy of awarding promptly, and as promptly as it can be done, to the party who appears to be elected, his seat upon this floor, upon the principle that the people of the district are interested, and that the whole country is interested, in having every portion of the country represented.

Mr. THOMAS. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SCOFIELD.) Thirteen minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. I had purposed to yield the rest of my time to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TODD.] Does he desire to speak?

Mr. TODD. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to participate in this debate. As, however, the floor is awarded to me, I will say a few words. It seems to me that this is a very plain, simple case. The facts are few and the principles of law are simple; and to enable the House to understand it thoroughly there needs neither an extended statement nor an elaborate argument. To my mind the case is identical, on all-fours, with the case of Hodges and Ganse, which was decided the other day by the House, and upon which Mr. Hodges was seated. In the Committee on Elections there was no disagreement in regard to Judge Wilshire's right on the prima facie case. Some of the members of the committee, however, refused to concur in the pending resolution on the ground that in the consideration or examination of the prima facie case certain facts were developed which led them to believe that Judge Wilshire would not be entitled to the seat upon its merits; and they were unwilling to declare in favor of seating a man on the prima facie case when probably they would be compelled to eject him from that seat upon the merits.

The majority of the committee, however, declined to take this view of the case, for three reasons: First, they were limited by the resolution of the House to inquire into the prima facie case; secondly, they regarded the prima facie case as separate and apart from the case on its merits and entirely independent of it; and, thirdly, they considered that pending the trial of the case upon its merits the people of the third district of Arkansas were entitled to representation on this floor.

Now, upon an examination of this case it appears that on the 5th day of November, 1872, an election for Congressmen was held in the State of Arkansas. By the law of Arkansas the precinct returns are required to be returned to the county clerk within five days after the election is held. It his duty then to make an abstract of those votes, and forward them, under his certificate, to the secretary of state, who, by the same law, is required in thirty days after that time to arrange and cast up the number of votes given for Congressman in each district; and then it is made the duty of the governor to issue his proclamation declaring the result of that election, and to issue a certificate to the member-elect.

The majority of the committee hold that under the law of Arkansas the secretary of state was constituted the canvassing board for the purpose of ascertaining the result of the election, and that the order to the governor to issue his proclamation and certificate on the ascertainment of that result was merely directory. In this case, on the 14th of December—the thirtieth day, as required by law—the secretary of state did cast up and arrange the votes given for member of Congress in the third district. By that casting up and arrangement it clearly appears that Judge Wilshire had a large majority of the votes. It is in evidence that this was done, as required by law, in the presence of the acting governor; and that the acting governor, either then, or at least not later than the 28th day of December, actually did make out and write his proclamation declaring the results, and filed that with the secretary of state in his office; but either through neglect, omission, or a willful non-compliance with his duty, that proclamation and certificate never were issued.

The committee hold that, this result having been legally ascertained by the canvassing board, and that Judge Wilshire was elected, the nonperformance of a directory duty on the part of the governor does not destroy his right to a seat on this floor. Then, if I remember correctly, the acting governor went out of office on or about the 5th of January, 1873. He was succeeded by Governor Baxter, who, upon inquiry, ascertaining that the proclamation and certificate had not been issued, assumed to discharge the duty which was incumbent on his predecessor, and in his proclamation and certificate he cites the reason. In the proclamation, which will be found on page 4 of the report, he starts out in these words:

> Whereas the acting governor failed to issue a certificate of election to the person who received the highest number of votes for Representative in Congress from the third congressional district of Arkansas, at the election held in said district on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1872.

Here, Mr. Speaker, is a clear recognition of the fact that on the 14th day of December the secretary of state, who is constituted a canvassing board, did cast up and arrange the votes cast at that election, and ascertained that Mr. Wilshire was elected. But the governor says in this proclamation that, inasmuch as the then acting governor did not issue his certificate and proclamation on that casting up, he undertakes to do it at a subsequent day.

We believe that this act of Governor Baxter, on the 18th of February, 1873, was clearly an act of supererogation; that it neither adds to nor detracts from the prima facie right of Judge Wilshire to his seat in this House upon the canvass made by the secretary of state on the 14th of December, 1872. If, however, there is any weight or authority to be given to this proclamation of Governor Baxter, it supplements and strengthens the certificate of the secretary of state himself, because it will be observed that, in the very table published by him, the right to the seat is admitted to be in Judge Wilshire, and the notes appended to his certificate form no part of the canvass or of the proclamation itself. That was the individual act of the governor, giving his interpretation of the character of the votes, and was wholly outside of the certificate. They can neither control, contradict, nor impair it; they are no part of the certificate whatever, because the governor, by his official character and position, was not authorized to make any of those notes, the law not conferring upon him the power to determine the canvass of votes. They are overwhelmed and overridden by the text itself, and can have no importance and no application whatever.

Now this case is presented simply in one aspect. If I apprehend rightly what has been the practice of the House heretofore it has been to determine prima facie cases upon the documentary and legal evidence adduced in support of them; and in no case where the prima facie case has been brought before the House have the merits ever been permitted to come in and interfere with the legal and documentary title. That is a question subsequently to be inquired into, and the two questions are entirely separate and distinct, controlled by different principles of law. They stand upon different and individual grounds. In this case we have the plain facts clearly stated; the prima facie right of Judge Wilshire to the seat is established by the canvassing board, and it is the duty of the House to seat him upon that prima facie right, irrespective of any result that may follow hereafter upon an investigation into the merits of the case.

I desire here to call attention to what I have no doubt is a misprint in the table submitted by the minority of the committee. On page 5 of their report there is published an abstract of returns of an election held in Pulaski County, Arkansas, on Tuesday, November 5, 1872. In that abstract there is a tabular statement of the votes cast. The first column, according to that statement, shows the votes for "W. W. Wilshire;" the second column for "Thos. M. Gunter;" the third column for "S. M. Gunter;" the fourth for "Wilshire;" the fifth for "Gunter;" the sixth for "T. M. Gunter;" the seventh for "Thos. M. Gunter;" the eighth for "Thos. N. Gunter;" and the ninth for "Thos. M. Gunter." They are all printed as if they were given for a man named "Gunter." The votes set out as given for "T. M. Gunter," footing up 343, were cast for "Thos. M. Guntee;" as also the votes footing up 138 in another column, set out as given for "Gunter," were given for "Gunther." So also in the next column there is a misprint; it should be "Guntee." And in the second before the last column, where it is printed "Thos. M. Gunter," it should have been printed "T. Ros Gunter."

Now, on the examination of this table the committee confined themselves to the question as to the number of votes given for W. W. Wilshire and Thomas M. Gunter, and they did not inquire into the question of fact whether the votes cast for "Thos. N. Guntee" or "T. Ros Gunter" were in reality votes cast for Thomas M. Gunter; for upon the face of this table the name was essentially different, and we had no authority to inquire into the question of fact whether they were the same.

Mr. SPEER. Will my colleague allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. TODD. Certainly.

Mr. SPEER. Do not the original returns on file show that the name is "Thomas M. Gunter," and that the names returned "T. Ros Gunter" and "Thos. M. Guntee" are forgeries, made by somebody else?

Mr. TODD. I do not so understand it.

Mr. SPEER. Are not the returns on file showing the name "Thomas M. Gunter?"

Mr. TODD. I think my colleague is entirely mistaken.

Mr. POTTER. On file with the committee?

Mr. SPEER. On file with the committee; not a certified copy but the original returns. It is the certified copy that shows "T. Ros Gunter" or "Thos. M. Guntee;" the original returns show "Thomas M. Gunter."

Mr. TODD. I am not prepared to say whether my colleague is correct or not. But I do say that these names appear in the manner and spelled in the mode in which they are in the certificate of the governor as filed, and which is the only evidence before the committee.

Mr. SPEER. You refuse to look at the original returns on file with us.

Mr. TODD. The answer to that is simply this: that in considering the prima facie case the gentleman desires to travel out of that and investigate the merits of the case, which the majority of the committee believed were not before them. The evidence before them was the certificate of the governor, and that certificate shows upon the face of it that the names which the minority of the committee have had printed as "Gunter" were "Guntee" and "Gunther." The committee were not allowed to arrive at the conclusion that the one was intended for the other.

Mr. LAMAR. I do not desire to detain the committee in vindication of the positions which the minority have assumed in the report and the resolution which they have submitted to this House. I may, before the conclusion of the debate, correct some of the mistakes of fact into which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TODD] has fallen as to what transpired in the committee. At present I will yield a part of my time to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY.]

Mr. MCCRARY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a good deal of reluctance that I feel bound to antagonize the report of the committee in this case. If it had been a case involving the consideration of testimony to any great extent, I should probably not have taken the pains to look into it, and should have followed the committee, as is my usual rule in such cases. But, sir, it being a simple case as to the prima facie right to a seat in the House pending the contest, which is to be decided upon the face of the papers themselves, I have felt it my duty to look into it, and have come to the conclusion that the case ought to be recommitted for investigation upon the merits.

I adhere as firmly as any gentleman can do to the rule which has been laid down in many cases of this character, that where there is a fair prima facie case made out upon the face of the credentials, the House ought not to go beyond that and make any investigation or inquiry in the first instance as to the merits of the contest. But, sir, there is no case here upon the face of these credentials. The governor of Arkansas does not certify that either of these gentlemen was elected. His certificate only goes to the extent of stating that an abstract of the votes which is appended to the certificate is a correct abstract. This is a very significant fact, Mr. Speaker, because the statute of Arkansas itself expressly requires that the governor shall certify the person having the highest number of votes to be duly elected to represent the State in the House of Representatives.

I read from the fiftieth section of the statutes of that State, as copied in the majority report. After providing that the votes shall be counted and cast up in the presence of the governor, the statute proceeds:

And the governor shall immediately thereafter issue his proclamation declaring the person having the highest number of votes to be duly elected, &c.

Now, the proclamation which the governor issued in this case and the certificate which he subsequently issued made no statement at all as to the person who was duly elected at that election; but, on the contrary, simply made a statement of this character:

I, Elisha Barker, governor of the State of Arkansas, do certify that the foregoing statement, with the explanatory notes, is a full, true, and correct exhibit of the votes polled for Representative from the third congressional district, &c.

Now, I grant you, Mr. Speaker, if that statement showed upon its face necessarily or prima facie that any gentleman was elected, this certificate of the governor might be held to be sufficient. But the certificate itself refers us to the schedule, and simply declares that that schedule is a correct statement of the votes as returned.

Now, sir, does the schedule show that Mr. Wilshire was elected? Gentlemen say that it does, because it shows that he received more votes than any other individual who is therein named. It shows that Mr. Wilshire received 12,522 votes, while Thomas M. Gunter received 11,961; and it shows 1,456 votes returned as "scattering." That is a very remarkable fact upon the face of it. I should be inclined to suspect that there was something wrong with a certificate that returned so large a number of votes as "scattering" without having said for whom they were cast.

But the governor appends as part of the certificate what he calls "explanatory notes;" and in those explanatory notes we are told that these scattering votes were polled for "S. M. Gunter," "T. M. Guntee," "Thos. M. Guntee," "T. Ros Gunter," and "Thos. M. Crenter." Nearly 1,600 votes referred to as scattering are in this note shown to have been cast for the names that I have read.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is almost self-evident—it is morally certain to every man who will give a moment's reflection to the matter—that every one of these votes thus referred to in the governor's certificate, and made a part of it, were intended to be cast for Thomas M. Gunter. It is a very easy thing to change a capital "T" into a captal "S." Perhaps it may have been originally written "T. M. Gunter" and returned by some person's mistake as "S. M. Gunter;" or, what is perhaps more probable, returned in that way by design.

Then, here is the name "Guntee." Unquestionably it is simply a change of the last letter from an "r" to an "e," making it read "Guntee" instead of "Gunter." Then I call the attention of the House to the name printed "T. Ros Gunter," which is undoubtedly in the original "Thos." or "Thomas"—at least I have no doubt of it myself. There is a large number of votes returned as scattering because the name was written in this way.

I call attention of the House to these matters not because they pertain to the case on its merits, for I do not go into that; I call attention to them because they are a part of the governor's certificate itself. He returns to the House this one in which he returns these votes as scattering which are set down to these names. Will anybody say such a paper as that on the face of it shows Mr. Wilshire was elected as the Representative from that district? If there was no explanation in regard to the votes returned as scattering, it might be claimed with some show of reason we are forbidden to inquire whether any of them was intended for either of these gentlemen; but when explanation is given, I say it makes it morally certain to every man in the House these votes were thrown out because the orthography of the name had been slightly changed when they were fairly and honestly cast for Mr. Gunter.

Now, since the governor does not certify either of these gentlemen is elected, since he returns to us this abstract and refers us to these votes, and since on the face of these papers it is apparent there is at least great doubt as to the question which of these gentlemen is elected, it seems to me it is a case which ought to go to the committee for investigation on the facts.

Reference has been made to a case decided in the last Congress, and the report of the committee seems to be based largely on the precedent established in that case. I refer to the case of Mr. Clark, of Texas. If any gentleman will take the pains to examine that case, he will see it was a very different case from this. In that case the statute of Texas created a board of officers known as the returning board. It conferred upon them judicial powers. It authorized them to investigate the charges of fraud, intimidation, and violence at the polls, and it empowered them, upon such investigation, to reject any polls they believed ought to be rejected. The governor certified that Mr. Clark was duly elected, but went on to say a large number of votes had been rejected by reason of violence, intimidation, and fraud under the statutes, and the testimony was laid before the committee. What the House decided in that case was, this board of officers, created by the statute of Texas, having judicial power in the premises, having decided the question and declared Mr. Clark to be duly elected, and declared certain polls to be tainted with fraud and violence, their action was prima facie correct, and must be accepted by the House until after the investigation into the facts, and it was ascertained it was not correct. This is a very different case. The governor of Arkansas, as I have already said, does not decide the question. He does not declare anybody to be elected. In violation of the statutes of the State, he declines or refuses, or at any rate he fails to certify, but lays before the House these returns and this schedule, and leaves it for us to determine.

I say under these circumstances the committee ought to investigate the facts. If I am not mistaken it will turn out on the proof—and I judge only from what I saw on the face of these returns—it will turn out these votes returned as scattering were fairly and honestly cast for Mr. Gunter, and the confusion has arisen either by mistake or design in changing one or the other of the letters of his name, making it what we see in these returns. I suppose the evidence has been taken, and I presume the case can only be decided on its merits. This district cannot be long left without representation upon this floor. But if I am compelled to make a choice between admitting to a seat pending the contest the gentleman who, from the papers before me, was not elected, or leaving the district vacant until there can be an investigation, I prefer the latter course. But I do not care to prosecute the consideration of this case any further.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I should like the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to yield to me two or three minutes.

Mr. LAMAR. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I had the honor of making the report from the Committee on Elections of the last House in the case of Clark and Giddings, which it is claimed is the authority upon which the present committee have proceeded. I desire to read one sentence from that report. That single sentence seems to me to sum up the whole case:

It is enough for a prima facie case if a certificate come from the proper officer of the State, and merely shows that the person claiming under it has been adjudged to be duly elected by the official or board on whom the law of the State has imposed the duty of ascertaining and declaring the result.

Mr. THOMAS. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say that that case was merely cited to show that no special form was required. Suppose that instead of having the words "duly elected," the governor had said that Mr. Clark had received 20,000 votes and Mr. Giddings 5,000 votes, and said no more, would not that have been equivalent to declaring Mr. Clark elected?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I will come to that presently. To give a man credentials, that is to give him a certificate which entitles him to have the Clerk put his name on the rolls of the House, the adjudication and certificate of the proper State officer are necessary, showing in some form that he was duly elected. Now in the case of Giddings vs. Clark, the governor and secretary of state declared in terms that Mr. Clark was duly elected, and the question was whether or not, under the law of that State, they were the proper certifying officers; and we held that they were.

But in this case the governor does not declare any such thing. If a certificate declares that on counting the votes it appears that John Brown had 1,000 votes and that John Smith had 950, and that 100 votes were scattering, it does not show whether the person who received those scattering votes was or was not the same person or one of the other candidates to whom the addition of those votes would give a majority. And this certificate does not declare whether the law of that State makes a majority or plurality necessary to elect.

Now, if you go into that question you go into the merits. You cannot go into the State law on the prima facie case or into the facts except just far enough to see who is the proper certifying officer. You are to do just what the Clerk of the House would do if the party presented himself before the House and asked to have his name put on the roll.

Now, in answer to the question of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. THOMAS,] I will say that I conceive that no form of words is necessary in the credentials; that if the governor or secretary of state says it appears a man was duly elected, that will do; that if he says an election was duly held, at which A B had all the votes, which is substantially the same case as the gentleman put, that would be sufficient. But it must appear clearly and distinctly that there was an adjudication in some form by the governor, that he declared his opinion in such a form that it becomes a necessary inference that that was the result.

Now here there is no such statement. The certificate of the governor is entirely consistent with the statement that either Wilshire or Gunter was duly elected, because he says Wilshire had so many votes, Gunter had so many votes, and that there were so many scattered votes polled for Guntee, so many for Gunter, and so many for other persons, without saying for whom that large number of votes was to be counted. He leaves that entirely indeterminate; and, therefore, I submit that the case of Clark and Giddings is a direct authority, as far as the opinion of the committee goes, for Mr. Gunter, and not for Mr. Wilshire; and, in fact, is a direct authority against seating Wilshire on a prima facie case before the merits are investigated.

Mr. LAMAR. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SCOFIELD.) Thirty-five minutes.

Mr. LAMAR. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER.]

Mr. POTTER. It has been my misfortune in election cases to sometimes differ from my friends on this side of the House, so much so that it has occurred that I have been the only member on this side of the Hall voting as I did. In the Forty-first Congress I was for a short time a member of the Committee on Elections, the chairman of which was Mr. Paine, of Wisconsin, a very radical republican, but a sound lawyer and an honorable man. During the brief time that I was on the committee with that gentleman I never had occasion to differ from him on any election case. I also served for a short space in the Forty-second Congress on the Committee on Elections, of which my friend from Iowa who has spoken in this case [Mr. MCCRARY] was chairman; and if my recollection serves me, I rarely or never had occasion to differ with him in regard to any case which came before that committee. And I am glad to be able to-day to find myself clear in taking exactly the same views of this case as he has done.

This is, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TODD] has said, a case of apparent right, not of merits. But all that clearly appears, as I think, is, that the prima facie case is with nobody. The law required the governor of Arkansas to declare who was duly elected. And if he had so declared, even if he had declared it erroneously, we should be bound in the first place, and until investigation of the merits could be had, to accept his certificate; but he has taken good care in this case to declare nothing of the kind.

There were two governors in power during the period covered by these certificates, and they have neither of them certified any person to have been elected from the district in question. In the first place, acting Governor Hadley refused to make any certificate, and thereupon the succeeding governor, Governor Baxter, because his predecessor has refused to take any action, proceeds in accordance with law to declare—what? Who is duly elected as the statute provides? Not a bit of it. But he proceeds to declare the returns of certain votes cast, which returns he sends here to us, expressing no conclusion from them whatever.

Now, even if—as I am not prepared to concede—even if it be true that we could look at that return and determine the prima facie right by that alone, the return, as has been well said by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] shows no right in Mr. Wilshire. It discloses when analyzed this condition of things: that Mr. Wilshire by his full name received 12,644 votes; that Mr. Gunter by his full name received 11,499 votes; that Wilshire without any pre-name received 12 votes; and Gunter without any pre-name received 591 votes, making for Wilshire 12,656 votes, and for Gunter 12,090 votes, leaving, as the count then stood, 566 majority for Wilshire. It then shows certain counties that, perhaps, ought not to have been included at all, because they were not by law in that congressional district. One of these gave majorities for Wilshire, the other for Gunter. Subtracting the vote in both, we would have 50 votes more to add to the majority for Wilshire. Then an error is stated in Washington County, which would make, if allowed, Wilshire's majority 656 votes. And then there is a return from Pulaski County giving 1,456 votes to various names of Gunter.

Now, in order to determine upon that return that Wilshire is elected, we must take it for granted and assume that those 1,456 votes from Pulaski County, or the majority of them, at least, were not intended for Gunter. Without that assumption, even this certificate makes no prima facie case for Wilshire. But the moral probability, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] says, is immense that these votes were all intended for Gunter; for they were votes for a person whose name answers so closely to his that the slightest miswriting would produce such a result as was produced. We have therefore a showing here in which Mr. Wilshire has more votes than Mr. Gunter by name, excluding all these alleged miswritten votes, but have also to deal with 1,456 votes more, some of which certainly were cast for Gunter, and all of which probably ought to be counted for him, and which appear by this very certificate equally with all the other votes for either candidate. Had the return stated how many of these so-called scattering votes were for each name we might decide at once what, like the votes for "Crenter," ought not to be allowed prima facie to Mr. Gunter. But the certificate does not give this, and we therefore cannot tell how many of these misspelled votes should be allowed; but since they may amount to votes enough to overbalance the majority in the other counties for Wilshire, you cannot say, judging even by the certificate alone, that Mr. Wilshire is elected.

Upon such a return as this, I say that nobody would be justified in saying that Wilshire was elected. On the contrary, if it justified anything, it would justify the opposite conclusion. But I think the minority of the committee are right in saying the certificate itself does not justify any conclusion at all as to who was elected, and therefore this matter should be recommitted to the committee, to be proceeded with upon the merits.

It is very significant to my mind that when the law required the governor of Arkansas to make declaration of who was elected, he should have declined to do anything of the kind. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TODD] says we must discard this certificate which the governor did give and take the former count of the secretary of state. The law says nothing of the kind, and if the gentleman will look at the two counts made by the secretary of state, he will see that these counts do not agree. In the former count, made prior to the 13th of January, he gives a different result from what he gives in the count he made on the 14th of February. Besides, even in that first count he returns 1,127 as scattering votes, which it appears by the subsequent certificate should, to some extent at least, be counted for Gunter, although in this first certificate they are returned under the general lump head of "scattering."

Now, it may be well to notice in this connection what has been the practice in the State of Arkansas. The law says the governor shall declare who is elected under the seal of the State. I hold two certificates in my hand—one for the first district of that State for the Forty-second Congress, and one for the second district for the present Congress. The certificates, as the House will see, are gotten up with most elaborate seals, finely engrossed, and in due form. The one declares as follows:

I, J. O. Hadley, acting governor of the State of Arkansas, do hereby certify, that at the general election held on the 5th day of November, 1872, O. P. Snyder was duly elected a member of Congress to represent the State of Arkansas in the Congress of the United States beginning March 4, 1873, from the second congressional district of this State.

That is the one for the last Congress, and the other for the present Congress is exactly in the same form, and equally formally got up. And yet this identical Governor Hadley, who signed both of those certificates, refused to give to Mr. Wilshire any certificate of this kind at all. On the contrary, he refused to give him anything. His successor sends, what? Nothing but this tabular result of votes, which, if it shows anything, shows that Mr. Gunter was elected, as the gentleman from Iowa says. Upon that state of things it would be a very dangerous precedent, as it seems to me, to attempt to seat anybody; certainly to seat Mr. Wilshire.

One word to the gentleman who reports this resolution [Mr. THOMAS] about the case of Covode and Foster. He refers to that case as one of authority, and says it is decisive of this case; it was exactly parallel. In that case the governor of Pennsylvania gave certificates to every member elected from that State, except in the district in which Covode and Foster ran. In regard to that district he refused to certify who was elected, just as the governor of Arkansas refused to give any regular certificate for the district in question here. In the Covode and Foster case the governor of Pennsylvania sent certain lists of figures here, and a statement in which he declared that in his opinion Mr. Covode was elected. Upon that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CESSNA] introduced a resolution to the effect that Mr. Covode had the prima facie right to a seat. But the chairman of the Committee on Elections moved as a substitute for that resolution that which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read, and which will be found in the Congressional Globe.

Resolved, That the contested-election case from the twenty-first congressional district of Pennsylvania be recommitted to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report, upon the merits of the case, who is entitled to represent said district in this House, with authority to make regulations in reference to the mode of conducting the contest and taking testimony.

Mr. POTTER. That resolution is exactly like the resolution reported from the minority of the committee in this case, and it was then adopted; and by turning over to the next page of the Congressional Globe gentlemen will see the vote by which the House adopted that resolution, refusing Covode the seat on his prima facie case, and recommitted the case to the committee. That is exactly the precedent which I think should be followed in this case, and is the only action which this certificate, upon which alone our action is now to be predicated, seems to me to justify.

Mr. LAMAR. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I had no thought of saying a word upon this subject; but some chance remarks which I have made in conversation upon the question have, as I judge, led the gentleman from Mississippi to call me out. I have been looking over the report in this case, seeking to make up my judgment as to how I should vote; and I will say plumply, to begin with, that if I am required to decide to-day, I shall vote to seat Mr. Gunter. If it be thought best that the case shall go through the form of recommitment, so that there may be some further investigation into the matter, I am willing to vote with the minority of the committee in favor of that proposition; but judging by what appears in this report, I do not see how any man can have a reasonable shadow of doubt that Mr. Gunter was the man elected by the people of that district.

This paper of the governor, which is not a certificate of election, but a certificate of certain returns, shows that Mr. Wilshire received 12,644 votes; that Thomas M. Gunter received 11,499 votes, and that there were a number of scattering votes for "Guntee," "S. M. Gunter," "T. M. Guntee," "Thos. M. Guntee," "T. Ros Gunter," and "Thos. M. Crenter," and also 591 votes for "Gunther." No one can doubt for whom those 591 votes were intended. There was no man named Gunther running; and those votes beyond question must have been intended for Mr. Gunter. There were over 1,400 votes in Pulaski County which are returned as "scattering." Now, we find the return of that county on page 11 of the report, and it clears up a good deal of the mystery which arises in connection with the following note to the general abstract:

The scattering vote in Pulaski County given to "Wilshire," "Guntee," "S. M. Gunter," "T. M. Guntee," "Thos. M. Guntee," "T. Ros Gunter," and "Thos. M. Crenter," is a literal copy of the clerk's returns.

Now if any man will amuse himself by taking a pen or pencil and scribbling the name "Thomas M. Gunter," he will see how very easily a careless or dishonest clerk might make all those variations of the name. But, as I have said, this note is explained in a great measure by the return from Pulaski County, as given on page 11, from which, if it be truly printed, it appears that there was for "S. M. Gunter" 1 vote; for "Thomas M. Gunter" 343 votes; for "Gunter" 138 votes; for "T. M. Gunter" 353 votes; for "Thomas M. Gunter" 50 votes; for "Thomas N. Gunter" 33 votes; for "Thomas M. Gunter" 506 votes; for "Thomas M. Crenter" 32 votes. These 32 votes for "Thomas M. Crenter" are the only ones about which any man can have any doubt; and yet it is about as easy for a dishonest or careless clerk to write "Thomas M. Crenter" as to write "Thomas M. Gunter." Now if you treat these vote according to the obvious intent of the people of the district in casting them, you obtain from 900 to 1,400 majority for Mr. Gunter.

With these things before us in the reports and in the documentary evidence, what sense can there be in giving Mr. Wilshire a seat upon what is called a prima facie case? Sir, the philosophical reasons, if I may use the expression, or the judicial reasons, for awarding a prima facie seat, are absent in this case. It is not necessary to the organization of the House or to the commencement of the business of the nation that the prima facie seat be awarded to anybody. Two months and a half of the session have gone by, and nearly all the documentary evidence upon which the contest on the merits is to be decided is already before the committee. Though I do not know that I have any right to say it, yet I cannot see how the committee itself can have any doubt as to who is ultimately to occupy this seat; and perhaps it is not unkind to add that I do not see how Mr. Wilshire himself can come here and say that he has any right to a seat in this House.

I have never made any inquiry concerning the politics of these claimants. I suppose, however, from what I have heard, that Mr. Wilshire is a republican and Mr. Gunter a democrat. Of course, however, that has nothing to do with the judicial determination of the case. As I have said, unless there should yet be made some very strong statement in contradiction of what appears on the face of the papers from the committee, I should individually feel safe in voting at this moment to seat Mr. Gunter. I certainly shall not vote to give Mr. Wilshire a seat for one hour.

Mr. LAMAR. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy the time of the gentleman (which is so nearly exhausted) for not more than two or three minutes. Indeed, since I conceived the idea of making a remark or two on this case, the principal points that I intended to make have been presented by other gentlemen around me so much better than I can hope to present them, that I have in fact ceased to desire to submit any argument upon this question. It seems to me most manifest that the majority of the committee have mistaken, not only the effect of the credentials which were before them, but the purpose of the House in submitting this case to the committee for their report. If there had been any credentials showing clearly prima facie who was entitled to represent the third congressional district of Arkansas in this House there would have been no necessity for a reference of the case to the committee. But it is manifest that there were no such credentials before the House. The Clerk of the House, with the authority conferred upon him by law, declined so to decide, and refused to place the name of either of these gentlemen upon the roll as a member of the House; and as I have suggested, if it had appeared on the face of the credentials that either claimant was clearly entitled to be sworn in as a member there would have been no necessity for a reference. But it is manifest that the proclamation of the governor does not show who was elected or who was entitled to the seat. As has been remarked by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] if we were compelled to decide to-day as to which of these gentlemen is entitled to represent the district during the residue of this term, it would, as I conceive, be manifestly the duty of the House to give the seat to Mr. Gunter instead of Mr. Wilshire, and that without looking further than the facts appearing in the proclamation and certificate of the governor. Indeed, the manner in which the vote is given shows a fraudulent purpose somewhere to deprive Mr. Gunter of the seat to which he was clearly elected, and it does not become this House to permit this fraud to be consummated. Over 1,400 votes given for Gunter are returned as "scattering," without setting forth the persons for whom they were cast. Perhaps no better illustration could be given of the maxim that fraud deals in generalities.

Upon the papers before us for our determination it is impossible for any member, it seems to me, to look at them, and from them alone to come to the conclusion that Judge Wilshire is entitled to a seat on any prima facie case before this House.

But I wish to make this one point, and I rose simply for that purpose. The authority of the committee to act in this case was derived from the resolution referring the case to the committee.

Now, what was the resolution? It was that—

The credentials and papers in possession of the Clerk of the House, in the cases of contested elections from the first and third districts of Arkansas, be referred to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report at the earliest day practicable who of the contesting parties are entitled to be sworn in as sitting members of this House.

It was not that the mere proclamation of the governor containing columns of figures to be added up should be submitted. That could have been easily done at the bar of the House; that was not the duty devolved upon the committee by the resolution of the House; but that the credentials and papers in the Clerk's office, including of course the notes contained in the governor's proclamation, should be submitted. They were all, by the resolution, referred; and on the whole of these papers the committee was to decide who was entitled to be sworn in as sitting member. With that resolution, which gave the only authority, the committee had to act in the case. The majority has not, and does not pretend to have, looked further than this table of votes, and has refused to look at the notes appended thereto, which are as much a portion of the proclamation, and as important for understanding the case, as any other part.

It is argued, indeed, on the other side, that they had no right to go further, and that in face of the fact that the resolution which gave jurisdiction to the committee, gave them directions to look into not only the credentials, but also the papers in possession of the Clerk of the House. And it has been stated here on the floor by a member of the committee, and not controverted, that the original returns of the election, now in the hands of the committee and referred for their information, show that the 1,456 votes given in the proclamation as scattering were in fact cast plainly for Thomas M. Gunter, giving him a clear majority of all the votes cast. Yet with these papers in the hands of the committee, with the resolution of the House directing them to look into these papers, they have declined to do so, and they come here and report in favor of seating a gentleman whom even the proclamation of the governor, fairly construed, fails to show has received a majority or plurality of the votes cast.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for one moment. I intended to keep out of this debate, but I wish to correct the gentleman from Illinois in his statement. The paper was before the committee upon which the secretary of state acted and the governor in making his proclamation, and these votes are given correctly in the end of the governor's proclamation. There was a subsequent paper, which is said to be in evidence in the case, never in the office of the secretary of state, which I have never seen, although I have looked for it among all the papers.

Mr. SPEER. The original returns from the respective counties are on file in the room of the Committee on Elections. They were referred there by this House; but when they were called for by a member of the committee investigating this case a majority of the committee refused to look at them.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I desire to correct my colleague. I do not know what action the committee has ever taken to which he alludes. They have never refused to look at these papers on the application of any member of the committee; nor has any member of the committee here, or in their report, claimed the right to go to those papers.

Mr. SPEER. I do not know whether the gentleman belongs to the majority or not. I know he did not vote either way in the committee.

Mr. MARSHALL. I will conclude with the simple remark that the resolution referring this case directed the committee to look not only into what are called credentials, but which in fact are not credentials, but into all of the papers in the case in the possession of the Clerk of the House; and they do not pretend that such papers would make a case favoring the resolution which they have reported. I fear that I have already trespassed too far upon the kindness of the gentleman from Mississippi, whose brief time I am consuming. I have not thought proper to attempt to add to the force of the argument so forcibly made by other gentlemen on the questions arising on the face of the pretended credentials. Confining the investigation to that alone, it has been conclusively shown that the case should be recommitted, and I shall therefore vote for the resolution reported by the minority.

Mr. LAMAR. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HYNES. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy, although I fear the limited time allowed me will be too short to do justice either to the case or to my views. I represent the constituency interested in the settlement of this question equally with the gentlemen claiming seats in this contest, representing as I have the honor to do the State of Arkansas at large. I therefore feel it incumbent upon me to say what I shall upon this question. There is nothing of party in it; there is nothing of personal preference. Both gentlemen are my personal friends, and I should be glad to have them both in Congress. But we are not now electing a member of Congress. Our votes are not constituent votes to make a member of Congress. That is supposed to have been done by the electors of the third congressional district of Arkansas. We are simply, under our oaths and responsibility as members, saying who in our opinion was elected, and who is entitled to a seat upon this floor upon the papers before us.

I introduced the resolution which referred the credentials and papers in the hands of the Clerk of the House to the committee for the determination of the question who was entitled to be sworn in as a sitting member upon this floor. I submitted that resolution to the contestants upon both sides; both sides, I suppose, understanding perfectly well what papers were in the Clerk's possession, and therefore what papers would be referred to the committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the first inquiry is, what is the evidence before the committee? The House can only know so far as it is presented to us in the reports from the committee. Has either one of the gentlemen a certificate of election from the governor, as required by the State statute? Of course one of the parties has this and the other has it not, such party is at once entitled to a seat prima facie upon this floor; and the Clerk of the House has done him great wrong in not having originally placed his name upon the roll of the House. If both parties have certificates of election, then both are equally entitled so far as the certificate can give title; and therefore both are worthless, because, of equal solemnity and force, they falsify each other.

The majority report says that Mr. Wilshire has such a certificate. The minority report informs us that Mr. Gunter has precisely a similar certificate.

But it is said that the failure of the governor to issue a proclamation and certificate cannot deprive the party of any right growing out of his election. Of course not. It only deprives him of a proclamation and certificate as evidence of that fact, and compels the House to find other evidence thereof. But it is held that the succeeding governor did, two months after said canvass, make proclamation and did issue a certificate of the result. Well, assuming that he had the right to do that, what should he have done? The canvass had already been made as the law required. The secretary of state certifies that it had been made. The law also required that the secretary of state keep a record of such canvass. The canvass was a ministerial act, and when executed was exhausted. Now, if the succeeding governor wanted to issue a proclamation or certificate, will it be denied that he should have issued such proclamation or certificate upon the canvass so made? But he does nothing of the kind. The certificate itself shows that it was based upon a canvass made just two months after, entirely unknown to the law, and setting forth different results from that discovered by the original canvass. This of itself would vitiate the certificate.

But I think it is clear that the governor never intended the paper called by the report a certificate to be understood as anything of the kind. His foot-notes clearly show that, as well as the fact that each gentleman obtained precisely the same thing from him, while the law provides that he shall give the certificate only to the party elected.

But let us see what is this which the committee calls a certificate. Why, Mr. Speaker, let me direct the attention of the House to the terms in which this paper describes itself: "Abstract of the returns of election." It is simply a certified copy of an abstract in the office of the secretary of state, only that the governor assumes the functions of the secretary of state, and certifies to it instead of that officer, making it wholly worthless even as a copy of a record, so that in law it is not worth the paper upon which it is printed.

But give them all the weight they were intended by the governor to have—that of certified copies of a public record—and let us see what they are worth. We have one certified copy, under the seal of the secretary of state, who is the proper officer to certify to public records; and one under the signature of the governor, attested by the secretary; both purporting to be copies of the same original, with the exception that the returns from Johnson County are included in the latter. We have the certificate of the secretary of state, assuring us that the only returns received between the canvass of December 14, 1872, of which the certificate of the secretary of state gives us an abstract, and that of February 14, 1873, of which the governor purports to give us an abstract, were those received from Johnson County; and yet we find Pulaski County returned in the one 11,961, for Thomas M. Gunter, and in the other 11,499; while in the one 184 votes from Newton County are given to Thos. M. Gunter, and in the other given in a separate column for Thos. M. Gunther.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is no time for characterization. Sufficient for me to say that these facts alone turn this document out of doors, even as a copy of record.

But having exposed the character of the certificates, yet, such as they are, let us see what they show. They show 26,202 votes cast in all, of which W. W. Wilshire lacks over 900 of receiving a majority. Now, who has received that majority? It is given to various modifications of the name of Thomas M. Gunter. They show upon their face that the certificates of the secretary of state and governor are not true when they say that they show a full, true, and correct statement of the vote as shown by the records on file in the office of secretary of state. It is not full, true, or correct, because it aggregates the votes of Caroline township 506, and of Ashby township 227, and so on with over 1,400 votes as scattering, when they are certainly large enough for separate columns if 12 votes for Wilshire is a number sufficient for that purpose.

But to return to the question whether there is a certificate of election. Our State statute requires in its fiftieth section that after the canvass—

> The governor shall immediately thereafter issue his proclamation, declaring the person having the highest number of votes to be duly elected to represent the State in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and shall grant a certificate thereof, under the seal of the State, to the person so elected.

Has that been done? Does it require that the certificate shall be granted to all the persons who are candidates, and can we suppose that the governor expected us to regard it as a certificate when the same document is issued to both contestants? Has the governor issued it to the party elected, or does he declare that anybody is duly elected? Not at all. It may be argued by the majority of the committee that after the certificate was issued to Mr. Wilshire, it was then competent for somebody to issue a copy of the same as a public record to Mr. Gunter. But if that were the case the certificate would have been of record and the secretary of state would have been the proper officer to have certified a copy of it to Mr. Gunter. But we see by the foot-notes, as well as by the duplicate certificates, that the governor never expected that he would be regarded as certifying anybody elected.

So, Mr. Speaker, we discover that this is not a certificate of election at all, that it has none of the elements of a certificate in it, and that it never was intended to be regarded as a certificate of election by the officer who issued it.

As my time is limited, I will not delay further upon this branch of the case. What do we find in the absence of any certificate of election? I agree with the reasoning of the minority in every respect but one, and it is this difference which has led us, I think, to different conclusions. The minority seem to labor under the mistake that the secretary of state has certified to the correctness of both these statements of the vote. Of course, if that were so, I should agree with them that, being contradictory, they were both worthless, and forced us to go to the merits for any ascertainment of the results. But that is not so. The secretary of state is not responsible for a single statement signed by the governor. His name comes to be on the certificate only in attestation of the governor's signature; and that signed by the governor being of no value at all, as he is not the proper officer to certify to a public record, the secretary's certificate stands as far as it goes.

In the absence of such a certificate, what is the House then forced to do? To take the next best evidence that is at hand, as the report of the majority says. What is the next best evidence? It would be the original returns in the offices of the various county clerks in that district, if we could have them here; but we cannot get them, because the law requires that they shall be kept on record there. If we cannot get them, what is the next best thing we can get as the evidence upon which to determine the prima facie case of the Representative from the third district of Arkansas? Why, certainly, copies of these original returns, just what the governor decides from, in the office of the secretary of state. Have we copies of the original returns? We have them only so far as Pulaski and Scott Counties are concerned.

Mr. TODD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HYNES. Certainly.

Mr. TODD. I would ask the gentleman whether under the law of Arkansas the precinct returns are sent to the secretary of state, or whether the law of Arkansas does not simply prescribe that an abstract of these precinct returns shall be made by the county clerks, and that abstract certified to the secretary of state, so that there is no provision in the law of Arkansas by which the precinct returns shall get into the office of the secretary of state.

Mr. HYNES. That is true.

Mr. TODD. Therefore the argument of the gentleman, that we should go to those original returns, as found in the office of the secretary of state, refers to a record that cannot exist, and for which there is no authority of law.

Mr. HYNES. I must have failed to state my point sufficiently clearly, for I see I am misunderstood by the gentleman. The original returns in the offices of the county clerks of the various counties, to which I have referred, and which are known as county clerks' returns, the clerks are bound by law to retain; that is, the original abstracts made by them from the precinct returns and of which they send copies to the secretary of state. My position is that, in the absence of the governor's certificate, the best evidence it is possible for us to get is the certified copies of the original abstracts in the offices of the county clerks, and that they must rank as evidence the certified abstract of the copies to be found in the office of the secretary of state.

Mr. POTTER. If copies of these returns of the county clerks sent to the secretary of state had spelled "Gunter" "Guntee," that fact would be disclosed by an examination of the originals.

Mr. HYNES. Very likely. Let me repeat; my inquiry is, what do we find on record from which to determine a prima facie case? We find copies of the original abstracts in the offices of the clerks of Pulaski and Scott Counties; and as far as they go they are the best evidence that we have. So far as evidence from the other counties is concerned, we have to take the next best which we can find, and that is the evidence contained in the certified abstract of the secretary of state.

I ask permission of the House, as this is a matter of great interest to my constituents, to proceed a little longer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I was about to call the previous question, but I do not object to an extension of time for the gentleman.

Mr. HYNES. Now for the other counties. After considering the copies of the original abstracts from Pulaski and Scott Counties, we have to rely upon the certified copies or abstract of copies in the office of the secretary of state. These added together elect Mr. Gunter—without any of the modifications of names, amounting to 100 votes—by a majority of about 1,300 votes. It is not in our power to use the copy of the copy, which scatters the votes, when we have before us a copy of the original, upon which to ascertain the vote of Pulaski County, and which does not scatter.

I therefore dissent even from the conclusion of the minority of the committee, and hold that upon the papers that have been brought back to the House by the committee, giving rank to the strongest testimony, a clear prima facie case has been made out for Mr. Gunter, and that it is the duty of this House to seat him upon the case that has already been made.

Thanking the House for its indulgence, this is all I desire to say at this time. If the previous question is not seconded, and I can get the opportunity, I shall move to amend the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. THOMAS,] by inserting the name of Thomas M. Gunter in place of that of W. W. Wilshire, and test the disposition of the House upon it.

Mr. THOMAS. I now call the previous question.

TREASURY CONTRACTS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of February 13, 1874, in relation to contracts made under the authority of the Treasury Department in compliance with the act of May 8, 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT FUND OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a detailed statement of expenditures from the contingent fund of his Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, in compliance with the act of March 3, 1869; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports from the various Bureaus in his Department in relation to civil-service reform; which was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

H. K. BROWN'S STATUE OF WINFIELD SCOTT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the memorial of H. K. Brown, for an additional allowance for his equestrian statue of General Winfield Scott, lately erected in this city; which was referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF GALVESTON HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to an appropriation for the improvement of Galveston Harbor, Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draught of a bill to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1849;" which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF MILITARY PRISON COMMISSIONERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to an appropriation for the payment of two commissioners from civil life appointed on the military prison board under the act of March 3, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT OF OHIO RIVER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the improvement of the Ohio River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

INDIANS OF SILETZ AGENCY, OREGON.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the condition of the Indians of the Siletz agency, in Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MARTIAL LAW IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the date of the President's proclamation declaring martial law within the District of Columbia, and the period of its continuance; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 9, 1873, in relation to the appropriation made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874; also how much of said appropriation was expended prior to January 1, 1874; and also how much of the $4,000,000 appropriated by the present Congress has been expended, and for what purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SEA-BOARD AND ROANOKE RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to House bill No. 785, for the relief of the Sea-board and Roanoke Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1761) granting certain swamp lands in Holt County, Missouri, to said Holt County, for school purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 1769) for the relief of Colonel Daniel McClure, assistant paymaster-general.

ARKANSAS ELECTION CONTEST—GUNTER VS. WILSHIRE.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the seconding the demand for the previous question.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 79, noes 48.

Mr. ARCHER. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. As no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. THOMAS, and the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. ARCHER.

Mr. WILLARD. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question be seconded what will be the first question to be voted on?

The SPEAKER. The first question will be upon the resolution of the minority of the committee, which has been offered as a substitute for the resolution of the majority, and which proposes to recommit the question.

Mr. HYNES. If the gentleman from North Carolina will yield to me, so that I may get in my amendment and test the sense of the House upon it, I will not resist the previous question.

Mr. TODD. I understand that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] did yield for the purpose of enabling the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to offer his amendment.

The SPEAKER. That was the understanding when the report was made; and the Chair stated this morning that such was the state of the case. The Chair begs to state in regard to election cases the uniform habit has been, whatever phase may be presented, to let the propositions proceed pari passu, and have a vote on each. That is in accordance with the usage of the House, and the Chair regards that amendment as pending.

Mr. ARCHER. I withdraw my demand for tellers.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 29) authorizing the Secretary of War to detail medical officers of the Army to inquire into, and report upon, the cases of epidemic cholera, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1940) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by James McDonald, a warrant officer of the United States Navy, of a present from the King of Italy;

An act (H. R. No. 483) to authorize the cancellation of an export bond for a portion of the distilled spirits of John S. Miller, on board of bonded cars of the United States; and

An act (H. R. No. 1041) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 100) for the relief of Lieutenant Alonzo V. Richards;

An act (S. No. 269) to change the titles of certain naval officers, and for other purposes;

An act (S. No. 365) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, late first sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteers;

An act (S. No. 366) for the relief of Oliver Powers; and

An act (S. No. 361) granting a pension to Sciotha Brashears, late of the Seventeenth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry.

ARKANSAS CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina propose to take the hour to which he is entitled after the previous question?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not desire for myself more time, but I crave indulgence to make some remarks explanatory of what has been said on the other side.

Mr. LAMAR. I wish to know whether this division of time is to go on according to the understanding?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. THOMAS. They have had the last hour, and I have promised to yield to several gentlemen on this side of the House. If I can I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SPEER. I thought the understanding was we should have the time divided equally, both before and after the previous question.

Mr. THOMAS. Surely not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that understanding was arrived at.

Mr. SPEER. It was said publicly by the gentleman from Mississippi that such arrangement had been made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will remember that the Chair said, in the absence of the House coming to any agreement, it would proceed under the rules of the House, and the gentleman from North Carolina would be recognized first, then the gentleman from Mississippi, and if the House seconded the demand for the previous question he would of course give the floor to the gentleman from North Carolina to close the debate.

Mr. SPEER. I understood the gentleman from Mississippi to say, before the debate began, he was perfectly satisfied with the arrangement for an hour and a half on each side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggested it should proceed under the rules of the House. The gentleman from North Carolina, however, indicates a purpose to yield a portion of his time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, the case before this House, judging from remarks made by many gentlemen in support of the resolution offered by the minority of the committee, has been entirely misapprehended, as I assert with perfect deference to those who differ from me and the majority of the committee in relation to the case. By a resolution of this House, introduced by the gentleman from Arkansas, as he stated, on the second day of December last, two cases, one from the first district and the other from the third district of Arkansas, were referred to us with certain credentials and papers, to which we were restricted as a Committee on Elections, and to which this House properly ought to confine its attention in the consideration of this case. These credentials and papers are set forth in the majority report. Still, on the other side, in the minority report, the statement is persisted in that there was other evidence than that stated in this report. The minority has lugged in testimony entirely irrelevant to this case.

You, sir, as Speaker, laid before the House, subsequent to this resolution of December 2, the testimony and papers in the following contested-election cases, and the same were referred to the Committee on Contested Elections: Arkansas, first congressional district; Arkansas, second congressional district; Arkansas, third congressional district; Georgia, &c. These papers subsequently referred, were in contested-election cases, and they have no appropriate place in this report of the minority, and none in the discussion on this floor. Hence the misapprehension which has arisen.

I choose to confine myself to and to rely upon the certificate of Governor Baxter, both as to its form, substance, and legal intendment, as the only instrument of evidence, (if it be proper to call any certificate an instrument of evidence, using the word in its legal sense,) as sufficient evidence to establish prima facie right of Mr. Wilshire to his seat. But the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] the late chairman of the Committee on Elections, admits that if this paper shows upon its face that Mr. Wilshire was elected, then it was a proper certificate in accordance with the law of Arkansas. But I think he goes off and allows his own mind to be misled by disconnecting the abstract which shows the relative proportion of votes received from the certificate itself. Sir, the certificate makes that abstract a part of itself. But the governor, as it was his duty to do, set out an abstract obtained from the casting up and arranging of the votes, which was done in the secretary's office, and by which it is shown that Mr. Wilshire received a majority of 1,195 votes. He then appends certain explanatory foot-notes, and then follows:

STATE OF ARKANSAS, Executive Office:

Whereas the acting governor failed to issue a certificate of election to the person who received the highest number of votes for Representative in Congress from the third congressional district of Arkansas, at the election held in said district on the 5th day of November, 1872: * * * Now, therefore, I, Elisha Baxter, governor of the State of Arkansas, do certify that the foregoing statement, with the explanatory notes, is a full, true, and correct exhibit of the votes polled for Representative from the third congressional district of Arkansas, at the election held in said district on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1872, as appears from the returns of said election on file and certificates of clerks deposited in the office of secretary of state.

And that is duly signed by the governor. This certificate proper, if I may so designate it, following the foregoing statement, to wit, the abstract itself, makes the abstract a part of it. And would the gentleman say, if the abstract had followed it, that that would have made any difference, or that it would have made any difference if inserted in the body of the writing or the certificate proper? It is admitted that if the governor of the State had stated in any language that A B had 10,000 votes and C D 9,000 votes, it would thereby have been shown without any words on the face of the certificate that the governor intended to say that the majority of votes was cast for A B. And if that appears in any memorial or certificate transmitted by the governor to this House, I think they will consider it as seating Mr. Wilshire.

Is it to be said that the governor of Arkansas, who seemed at least willing to do his duty, would send a paper to this House that could have no legal effect, that ought to be "kicked out of the House," to use an elegant phrase employed by a gentleman on the other side to-day, if he did not intend it to be what it purports to be? Will it be said that he sent this without intending that it should declare any one duly elected? Is it not the rule, rather, that acts done by official persons, in the discharge of a legal duty, are presumed to be rightly done? Was it not the duty of the governor, under this section 50 of the statutes, immediately after the vote was arranged and cast up, to issue the proclamation and give his certificate of election? If he did not mean to do that he meant to do nothing. So that I think clearly that this House will say that he intended to show that somebody was elected.

I will not start to guess, sir, who has been guilty of fraud. I might guess that the clerk of Pulaski County had been guilty of fraud. I might guess that Governor Hadley had some motive for failing to issue a certificate, because in his presence the vote had been arranged and cast up.

But it is said that the words "duly elected" do not appear on the face of the certificate. I repeat, there is no form of a certificate which has ever been recognized by this House. There is no form prescribed in the laws of Arkansas; and if there were one prescribed, the House would not consider a mere variance occasioned by the omission or misuse of words a sufficient cause for keeping a member out of his seat.

I think it is natural that the governor should have made this statement precisely in the form in which he did make it. The secretary of state had previously stated that there were scattered votes to the number of about 1,300; and the governor, two months after the secretary of state had cast up and arranged the votes and ascertained the result in order to issue a certificate, and so discharge his duty under this section 50, had a new casting up and arranging; and he means to declare through this paper the result. Will this House then stop to inquire whether this governor had properly a new casting up and arranging of the vote? Will it stop to inquire how he ascertained at the secretary's office what number of votes Wilshire had received? All these inquiries would be proper in the determination of a contested-election case, but not here. It is to be presumed that the governor acted rightly, in order to determine his duty.

Now, sir, gentlemen, go off and guess, or assume, rather. If I should say that these scattering votes for Thomas M. Guntee, &c., were all cast for Thomas S. Gunter, this may perhaps be true. But your committee were not instructed to inquire into this matter of fact, and there was no evidence to show in what proportions the scattering votes were cast—how many for Thos. M. Crenter or others named. If that be true, this House cannot know it by any evidence before it; cannot know it otherwise than from statements of gentlemen who assume it to be true in this case. If that be true, it can only be ascertained in the contest pending, and it may affect the decision of the case upon the merits.

Allow me to say that this case is not a merely legal one. The State of Arkansas has rights on this floor. There is a duty for this House to discharge, in this great public inquiry, to the State of Arkansas, if it properly can do so, without being bound by strictly legal rules of evidence. Will you keep that State from representation here for six or twelve months it may be, if further time shall be allowed to these parties to take testimony, and additional evidence is taken before the report is made by the Committee on Elections, and the case determined upon its merits? Ought it not rather to be the practice of this House, and has it not been the practice of this House, to admit one to his seat pending the contest? Let the pending contest in this case go on, but admit Mr. Wilshire to his seat, in order that his State may be heard here, and that the House may be more thoroughly organized. Let justice be done to him and his State, without prejudice to the rights of the contestant by the adoption of the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Elections.

I now yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. It was not my intention to say a single word upon this question, and I would not now did it not seem to me that gentlemen, on this side of the House at least, are about to cast their votes upon a mistaken view of the facts. The question submitted in the resolution sent to the Committee on Elections was, who was entitled to be sworn in as the sitting member from this district of Arkansas? Of course, the papers, the certificates, and credentials, which would bear upon this question as to who was thus entitled to be sworn in, were proper subjects of consideration by the committee.

The committee took the highest evidence that was before it. It took the certificate of the abstract of votes, as they were certified to the committee and to the House by the secretary of state of the State of Arkansas, and the proclamation and certificate of the governor of the State showing what was the result of the election in that district. Both the certificate of the secretary of state and the proclamation and certificate of the governor of the State show by the footings of the votes cast in the different counties in that district that

Mr. Wilshire had distinctly received a majority of the votes cast. Having taken this, the highest evidence of which the case was susceptible, the committee decided that it was neither proper nor within their jurisdiction in this state of the case to examine in regard to other matters, and to consider evidence of an inferior character.

I now wish to direct the attention of the House a moment to a question raised by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.] He says that these votes that were cast for "Mr. Guntee," "T. Ros Gunter," and a few other names, different from Thomas M. Gunter, are morally certain to have been cast for Thomas M. Gunter; and being so, this House ought not to shut its eyes to that fact, and seat Mr. Wilshire on a prima facie case in the face of that fact. Now, the gentleman from Connecticut ought to be aware, it occurs to me, in making the statement, of the further fact, which gentlemen in this House seem not to have considered thus far, that this case is contested on many other grounds than mere differences of names. I am authorized to state, from my own examination, that the printed record of the evidence already filed and before the Committee on Elections will make a volume of from two to three thousand pages, and involving questions of intimidation, of fraud, and of imposition throughout hat dis trict.

Gentlemen here undertake to submit this case upon the idea that there is nothing involved in it except as to whether these votes for T. Ros Gunter, for Guntee, and others, shall be counted. I state that if this case is referred back to the committee, it must be in the face of the fact that the committee will be compelled to go through a volume of evidence of two thousand or three thousand printed pages, involving questions of fraud and intimidation.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] my distinguished friend, who I am told was formerly chairman of the Committee on Elections, says that the effect of these certificates is that there is no prima facie case. I submit to the lawyers, at least, upon this floor, whether the footings of the votes in the different counties, as shown in the report and the certificate of the secretary of state and of the proclamation of the governor, are not in substance and legal effect a declaration that 12,644 votes were cast for W. W. Wilshire, and 11,499 votes were cast for Thomas M. Gunter, and that the legal effect resulting from these facts is that Mr. Wilshire is therefore elected, having a majority of the votes cast. The foot-notes and explanations in connection with that report are not a part of that certificate, so far as to change the result shown by the footings in these different columns.

One more fact, and I am done. The minority of this committee in their report have inserted what they call a copy of the abstract of votes in the county of Pulaski, in the State of Arkansas. Now to show that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] is mistaken in asserting this to be a true copy, I will call his attention to this fact, that on page 11 of the report, as printed, there are four columns of the abstract, the second, fourth, seventh, and ninth, which purport to give the votes cast for Thomas M. Gunter. There are four columns in which the name is spelled with precisely the same letters in each column.

Now, while I have not seen the abstracts at all, and I have been unable to find them, the fact that there are four columns headed with the same name, spelled with precisely the same letters, is proof positive to every gentleman that this is not a true copy of the original. I undertake to say that no clerk that has any qualifications for the position would, in making out an abstract, give four headings to columns, each one with the same name, spelled with precisely the same letters. And I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that, by a mistake of his or a mistake of the printer, the House is being misled as to the fact.

Mr. LAMAR. The transcript to which the gentleman refers is on file in the office of the clerk of the Committee on Elections. There it is; and all that the gentleman has to do is to open his eyes and see it. I do not believe that this resolution of the House forbids any such exercise of the senses with which we are endowed by nature. If I am mistaken as to my copy, let it be verified by the production of the paper itself, which is on file.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. In answer to the gentleman's speech which I have allowed him to inject into mine, I say that there is the original certificate of the secretary of state, which declares, under the seal of the State, what is the original copy on file in his office. Then when I say that the original is there, the gentleman tells us that which he ought to know is not true. The original is on file in the county, and no man can remove it under the law.

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman is mistaken. I have made no such statement; and I will respectfully submit to the gentleman that he will advance the ends of truth by not allowing himself to be betrayed into such harsh expressions.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. What, then, did the gentleman say?

Mr. LAMAR. I said that the certified transcript of the original abstract on file in the clerk's office is in the committee-room. I have never stated that the original was there; and if the gentleman will read my report, he will see that I state that the transcript certified by the clerk is on file.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. Then the gentleman admits that he has only a certified copy of a copy?

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir; I say that we have a transcript of the original return; and that the certificate of the secretary of state certifies to a copy of a copy. The gentleman to whom the member from Ohio would give the seat—not the man to whom I would award it—has that copy of a copy. The paper on which I rely is a transcript of the original consolidated returns of Pulaski County.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to hinder the gentleman from making any statement of facts, but he must see that his evidence is of an inferior character to that on which I rely. The original returns of the county are required by law to be placed on file with the secretary of state. Now a copy of those returns is certified by the secretary of state, their proper custodian. But gentlemen on the other side undertake to make a record by going back to the certificate of the clerk, which is not legitimate evidence, while the paper on which I rely is evidence of the highest character.

I have thus gone over this matter, although I do not consider it proper in connection with this case; for I claim that, prima facie, the case must be decided upon the certificate of the officers having in charge the seal of the State; that we cannot in this case go behind that certificate, unless we violate another principle of law and hold that we will not allow a man to be sworn in as a sitting member until we ascertain that he is by right entitled to the seat. Now, in the face of the fact that this case is to be contested, as I stated before, upon a large amount of evidence which must be examined, and the examination of which must necessarily take time, I insist, Mr. Speaker, that there is not only a prima facie case made out here, but one which this House is bound to respect by admitting to the seat the gentleman whose claim has the sanction of the majority of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH,] the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SPEER. Did I understand the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] to say that he was going to occupy the whole of this hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised upon that point.

Mr. SPEER. I understood the Chair so to state.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from North Carolina at the beginning of his remarks to indicate to the gentleman from Mississippi that he would divide the time.

Mr. SPEER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina intend to occupy the whole hour?

Mr. THOMAS. I do. I trust in doing so I shall not be considered guilty of any discourtesy. Inasmuch as the minority have in their report lugged in evidence entirely irrelevant to the case, and calculated to prejudice the mind of the House, I must occupy the whole hour.

Mr. SPEER. Then you intend to remedy one wrong by the commission of another.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I surrender my right to the floor. I yield my fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.]

Mr. SPEER. I do not desire to speak upon the question. The chairman of the committee surely should not exhibit any passion in this matter.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Not at all. I think it fair that the other side should have a part of this time.

Mr. SPEER. I do not ask the time for myself. I do not want to occupy one minute in the discussion of this case.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. I yield my time to the gentleman, and he may dispose of it as he chooses.

Mr. SPEER. I thought the gentleman having charge of this case would be fair and would divide the time; but when he does not choose to do so, I do not of course wish to object to the gentleman from New York going on.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. Then I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to avail myself of the offer of the distinguished gentleman from New York, and would prefer that he should occupy some of the time which he has so generously accorded to me in giving his views to the House. If it is his wish to do so, I have not the slightest objection, and will assure him that it will not in the slightest degree interfere with any purpose of mine.

It was not my purpose to participate in this discussion. I was perfectly willing that the resolution submitted by the minority should stand or fall upon the reasons given in the report.

I do not, therefore, propose to detain the House by any argument upon the subject, but will briefly correct one or two erroneous statements which have been made. As reference has been made by the member from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] to party influences, I desire here to disclaim any offensive imputations of that character against my colleagues on the committee. The position of a member of this committee who belongs to a majority of the House is a delicate and trying one, and it is a painful one when it becomes necessary to take a stand against the interests of party friends to whom he is deeply attached, and possibly under great obligations of party fealty. The risk of losing their good opinion, or incurring ridicule for being too conscientious, or too judicial, makes the performance of duty hard and embarrassing.

I concur with the member from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] that this question should be decided without reference to party prejudices. There is, perhaps, in the Constitution no power which a majority can so easily use as an instrument of oppression as that which makes this House the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members. It opens an avenue by which the Government can reach the very fountains of political power. He who would drag such a question into the arena of party debate, or give his vote or raise his voice upon it with any motive less pure than truth, or with even a glimmering thought of party profit, trifles with the rights of the people, and is untrue to the high responsibilities of his position as an American Representative.

The question referred to the committee was, who is entitled, on the credentials and papers in possession of the Clerk of the House, to be sworn in as sitting member of this House? Taking this to mean, who is entitled to the prima facie right? the majority of the committee seemed to think that we were bound, no matter what was in those papers, to find that some one had the prima facie right to the seat. Such was not the view of the minority of the committee. Their view was that no person had such right from the papers to which the majority of the committee felt bound to restrict their examination.

The report of the majority, and the argument of the member from North Carolina, [Mr. THOMAS,] if I do not misunderstand it, assumes that the prima facie right is to be determined and established by the credential issued by the proper certifying officer of the State; that a certificate of the governor is the credential authorized by the laws of Arkansas; and that the certificate of Governor Baxter is in itself sufficient to establish the prima facie right of Mr. Wilshire. And he objects to the House considering the certified abstract of the returns from counties, because it goes behind the credential. Then why did he put the certificate of the casting up of the secretary of state into his report? Did he not go behind the credential when he drew from the secretary of state's office this aliunde evidence? When he leaves the credential for other evidence, who shall say where the line shall be drawn?

Allow me to call the attention of the House to this paper. A copy of it is on the first page of the report of the majority of the committee. What do you see there? You see 12,522 votes for Wilshire, 11,961 votes for Gunter, and 1,127 votes "scattering." Why are these 1,127 votes not put down to the names for whom they were voted, as the law of Arkansas requires to be done? It was because it would show unmistakably that they were cast for Thomas M. Gunter.

So far from being a fair and intelligible and honest casting up, it is on its face a cheating, deceptive, fraudulent contrivance to conceal the truth. Why did he not say who they were for—1,127 votes "scattering?" Whatever its motive, its effect is to render it impossible to tell from its face who is elected. This is as fatal to this paper as the unsupported evidence and credentials of Mr. Wilshire. But the governor's certificate shows the motive of this word "scattering." It shows that these votes were not scattering, but that they were cast for Mr. Gunter. The number of votes given for Thomas M. Crenter (evidently meant to be Thomas M. Gunter) is not specified; and therefore it is equally impossible to ascertain from the governor's certificate which received the most votes, W. W. Wilshire or T. M. Gunter.

According to the law of Arkansas the governor is required to certify and proclaim who is duly elected. Neither in this proclamation nor his certificate does he state or show who was elected. He does not even certify who, in his opinion, is elected; but he gives a statement which does not say who is elected, but shows Wilshire received 12,522 votes, Gunter 11,961, and then that there were some 1,400 odd votes cast for Gunter under various designations.

The gentleman says I have sought in the transcript of the abstract of the county returns to find something contradictory in this return. He is mistaken. Every reference I have made to the records has been made for the purpose, not of contradicting the governor's certificate, but for remedying the defect arising from its ambiguity. The member from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS] insists that the transcript of the returns in Pulaski County is irrelevant. How irrelevant? I have shown that the governor's certificate does not establish any prima facie right in any one. I am right in this; I have the authority of the gentleman's report for resorting to the transcript of those returns. On page 5 of his report he says:

> The most usual kind of credential is a certificate of the governor of a State, and such kind is required by the law of Arkansas. No particular form of one has heretofore been considered necessary by the House; and while such certificate, when it showed that the person named therein was regularly elected, &c., has always been admitted and held to be competent and satisfactory evidence of prima facie right to a seat, the House has frequently decided that the want of it from any reason would not impair or prejudice such prima facie right of a member-elect, but only remit him to other evidence to establish it.

Surely if he can be remitted to other evidence to establish his prima facie case, the committee and this House are not to be excluded from examining such evidence to see if it does or does not establish this right. But I have resorted to this evidence not for the purpose of showing any prima facie case for Mr. Gunter, but simply to show (as the minority report distinctly states) that these returns, so far from remedying the defects of Mr. Wilshire's claim, based on the certificate either of the governor or of the secretary, show Mr. Gunter to have been elected.

One gentleman says that in the investigation of this case frauds will be developed. Then, sir, there is the greater necessity for investigation of it on its merits. Do not seat a man on the floor of this House who comes with no title at all, whose entire claim is based on the slightest of misnomers, and who comes with a notice of a contest; and whose very certificate, when he presents it, does not say he is elected or show him to be elected. I ought not to say his certificate, for he has none—at least his competitor has one identically like it, which he filed here. The governor issued one to Gunter and one to Wilshire. Both are filed on the record. But neither gentleman is the bearer of a certificate which confers the prima facie right. And the minority do nothing but simply report that there is no prima facie right in the case, and they ask that it shall be recommitted to the Committee on Elections with the instruction to report upon the merits.

What has been the practice of the House? In the Pennsylvania case of Foster vs. Covode the attempt was made in like manner as the attempt is made here to seat Covode on papers relating to the prima facie title. The House refused, and adopted the resolution almost identical with the one I felt bound to report to the House. Such, too, has been the practice in the Senate.

I do not wish to detain any longer the House from the disposition of this case.

Mr. THOMAS. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Usually, where the majority of the committee have given a decision upon an election question, I follow the report of the majority without question; because I assume that they have made a more careful investigation than I can, and therefore that they would be more likely to be right than I should. The only case in reference to which, I think, in two Congresses, I have taken a part in the debate was the case of West Virginia, where I supposed there was no majority to support. Here I understand that a majority of the committee, composed of republicans, have unanimously made a report.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman is in error there.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I see no dissent from them; that is all I meant to say; and I heard no dissent from them on the floor.

Mr. LAMAR. Dissent from what? Dissent from the report of the minority?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; I have heard nothing but dissent from the minority.

I find, then, that the majority of the committee have examined this case and have come to a conclusion, and that conclusion is that Mr. Wilshire has a prima facie right to his seat. Now, finding that some of those gentlemen who go with the majority party of this House, not being members of the committee, have come to a different conclusion, and have endeavored to instruct the House how it should vote on this question, I think it may be permitted to me for a moment to give the views which will guide my own vote. First, I am inclined to think we have got two reports here upon two separate cases. I find that there was first submitted to the Committee on Elections the prima facie question on the credentials of Mr. Wilshire, and afterward there was submitted the question of the contest of Mr. Gunter. The majority of the committee have reported only upon the prima facie case submitted to them. The minority have reported on the other question.

Mr. LAMAR. The gentleman must allow me to correct him. The minority of the committee have reported on no feature of the case except the prima facie right to the seat.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Pardon me; I think I can show the gentleman that they have. The minority reason from the evidence and step out of the record to see what is the truth, and they assume that certain scattering votes here were given to Gunter. I do not know whether they were or not. If I were disposed to guess in the matter, I might guess the opposite.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me to interrupt him, I will say that the counsel of Mr. Gunter before the committee occupied six pages of his brief in showing that these votes which are now counted for Gunter could not be counted for him.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That only shows what I was trying to impress upon the House, that we have to go into the evidence before we can support the views of the minority.

The minority reason from evidence, reason from certificates, reason from similarity of names, reason from many things in order to show that Mr. Gunter is elected. I do not know whether he is or not. Therefore both of these reports may be correct, the majority on the prima facie case and the minority on the contested case.

But it is said that there is not a prima facie case. Very well; if that is so, that is an end of it. Let us see whether there is or not. In the first place, it is made the duty of the governor to certify to Congress, to this House, the result of the election. That is made his duty by a statute of the State. Then we have a statute passed May 30, 1870, which is very controlling, and which makes it a crime in him if he does not certify to the House the result of the election. Gentlemen will find it in volume 16 of the Statutes at Large, page 145. It makes it a crime in the governor if he fails to so certify. Under that statute Mr. Baxter first proclaimed the result of the election. This is what he says: "I, therefore, make proclamation of the same;" that is, the result of the election. Then he makes a certificate, as it is his duty to do, which will be found on page 4 of the report of the majority of the committee. This is his certificate:

STATE OF ARKANSAS, Executive Office:

Whereas the acting governor failed to issue a certificate of election to the person who received the highest number of votes for Representative in Congress from the third congressional district of Arkansas at the election held in said district on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1872; and whereas, on the 14th day of February, A. D. 1873, the secretary of state, in my presence, did cast up the votes polled for said Representative at said election from the returns on file in his office:

Now, therefore, I, Elisha Baxter, governor of the State of Arkansas, do certify that the foregoing statement, with the explanatory notes, is a full, true, and correct exhibit of the votes polled for Representative from the third congressional district of Arkansas at the election held in said district on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1872, as appears from the returns of said election on file and certificates of clerks deposited in the office of secretary of state.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the State to be affixed, at Little Rock, on this 18th day of February, A. D. 1873.

[L. S.] ELISHA BAXTER,
Governor.

By the Governor:
J. M. JOHNSON, Secretary of State.

That is, the governor obeys the law. Now, to whom did he give that certificate? He gave it to Mr. Wilshire, who brought it here.

Mr. LAMAR. And to Mr. Gunter.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am not on Mr. Gunter's certificate. He gave a certificate to Mr. Wilshire. Who brought it here? Mr. Wilshire. Who had it referred to the Committee on Elections? Mr. Wilshire. Who by law was bound to issue that certificate? The governor. We are only to look at what is on this page of the report. He puts in certain votes. Very well. But my friend from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] says with great force that if we look and see, we can see that those votes were for Mr. Gunter. The governor did not see it in that light, and we have to guess that "Crenter" means "Gunter." It does not up in my country. [Laughter.] How it is in Arkansas I cannot say. We are put into the region of conjecture. Now that is a matter of contest.

Looking upon the face of this certificate there is a clear declaration that Mr. Wilshire received a majority of the votes legally cast, and not put in the return as scattering. By taking the scattering returns you can always defeat any man's election in a close election.

Mr. LAMAR. The governor does not say "scattering," but he says "scattering" for "Thomas Gunter," for "T. M. Gunter," and other names, plainly designating Thomas M. Gunter as the person voted for.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Precisely; scattering votes, polled for "Gunter," "S. M. Gunter," "Thomas M. Crenter," or "Thomas M. Grunter," I do not know how it is. The gentleman from Mississippi says that means Gunter.

Mr. LAMAR. No; I do not say "Crenter" means "Gunter."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If it does not mean Gunter, who does it mean?

Mr. LAMAR. I do not say.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And Gunter does not say; no gentleman can say that it is Gunter. Why should the House say it is Gunter? That is the whole of it; there is the trouble. We have to go to the evidence; we have to go into an examination. The governor put these votes out of the list by putting them under the head of "scattering;" scattering votes for half a dozen different men.

Mr. LAMAR. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If I had time I would allow the gentleman all he wants.

Mr. LAMAR. I know that. I desire to say that is just this very point: there are 1,400 votes cast for "Guntee," "Gunter," "Thomas M. Gunter," "S. M. Gunter," "Thomas M. Crenter," &c., and I say the impossibility of saying whom those votes were for demonstrates that there is not a certificate of a majority for anybody.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Ah, pardon me; the governor states those votes were scattering.

Mr. LAMAR. For those names.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. For those gentlemen, yes. Not for Gunter; they were not scattering for him.

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They were scattering for other people, and the governor takes them out of the Gunter calculation. It is perfectly proper that on a contest they should be counted; and if it should be shown that those men intended to vote for Mr. Gunter, I should certainly vote for his seat on a contest. But, the governor performing his duty, and certifying who is elected, states that Wilshire had a majority of the votes cast; and then he states who had the scattering votes.

Mr. HYNES. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. HYNES. Was it not the duty of Governor Hadley to issue that certificate upon the canvass made within the time prescribed by law, and certified as made by the secretary of state?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Very good; I will answer that. I assume from the nature of the question that I have demolished the trouble with the certificate, and I will pass to this question of time.

Mr. HYNES. The gentleman misunderstands my question if he takes it that way.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did not get it, then.

Mr. HYNES. I will state this fact to begin with, that Governor Hadley failed to issue a proclamation and certificate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. HYNES. Governor Baxter succeeded, and did issue a certificate, so called by a majority of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. HYNES. Now, knowing the standing of the gentleman from Massachusetts in this body as a lawyer, I wish to ask him whether it was not the duty of the governor, upon the making of the canvass known to the statute, to issue the certificate within the time prescribed by law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When the governor came to do an official act he was bound to do it according to what he viewed to be his duty. He was giving but a prima facie certificate, and it was not for him to go into any inquiry.

Mr. HYNES. Just so; the gentleman exactly meets my point. I now want to state to the gentleman (as he was not in the House when I made my remarks) that the law of our State requires the secretary of state to keep a record of all acts and proceedings of the governor. The certificate shows that on the 14th of December, 1872, a canvass of the returns was made. Now, my question to the gentleman is, whether it was not the duty of the governor, if he issued any certificate or proclamation at all, to issue it upon a canvass made according to law? For the former governor had failed to issue the proclamation or certificate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I answer, no; and I will state why. It was the duty of the governor to issue a certificate of election; and it was his duty to certify to what he was convinced of. It would have been a sufficient certificate for him simply to have said, "I certify that Mr. Wilshire is elected." If Mr. Wilshire had come here with such a certificate, there would have been no doubt arising upon this case. Now, if the governor might have certified simply that Mr. Wilshire was elected, he is not bound to tell you where he obtained his knowledge, and if he does, it is none of your business how it affects his mind.

Mr. HYNES. Exactly so. The gentleman comes precisely to my point. The governor failing to certify that anybody was elected, and doing what the gentleman from Massachusetts says it was not necessary for him to do—stating that he issued a certificate upon a subsequent canvass not known to the law at all—I ask the gentleman whether that vitiates the certificate or not?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The governor's action was entirely within his power. He came into office and was told that he would be indicted for a crime if he did not certify who was elected. He goes to work and, on his official responsibility, makes his certificate upon what appears right to him. If he has done wrong, (and here is the error of the minority case,) that is a question for the contest upon the merits.

Now, as I was about to say when interrupted, the majority come in here and report simply upon a prima facie case, because our law declares that whenever a man comes here with credentials legal in form he has a right to the seat. The majority of the Committee on Elections have found that this man upon his credentials is entitled to the seat, subject to the right of contest by his opponent.

Now, the committee can turn around next week, after they have all the evidence before them, and can report in favor of unseating this man. But the difficulty with the minority report is that it attempts to unseat a man without evidence; that we are thrown into the region of conjecture; and it is proposed that Arkansas shall be deprived of her representation, that her governor's certificate, issued in pursuance of his legitimate authority, shall be ignored, and that the case shall be sent back to the committee because there is a contest.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the House will permit me—for my time has been very much taken up with interruptions—I wish to say but a word further; and that is this: When the governor has done his duty it is for us to do ours. This was precisely the ground taken in the Senate, upon the election case of Pinchback, by the learned chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He said, "Seat Mr. Pinchback on the prima facie case; and if anybody has anything to say against it, he can be turned out on a contest."

If we recommit this case to the committee, for what purpose do we recommit it? That they may do simply what we told them to do in the first instance—report who is entitled to the seat upon the prima facie case; that is their first duty. Afterward comes the report as to who has the right upon the contest.

Mr. LAMAR. That is not my resolution.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That must be the effect of a resolution to recommit.

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. You recommit the question as it stands.

Mr. LAMAR. I ask that my resolution be read.

Mr. HYNES. I hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts, before he sits down, will answer me one question to settle a difficulty in my mind.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not think I can do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HYNES. I know the gentleman can do it if anybody can. If the governor of Arkansas, after the canvass known to the law had been made, had issued his certificate of election, I suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts would not hold that then the succeeding governor, upon a subsequent canvass, could have issued another certificate. Assuming that to be the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I now ask him this question: The secretary of state, in the presence of the former governor, having made the canvass, and so much of the ministerial duty having been performed, was there anything left for the governor succeeding him to do but to finish the act by issuing the proclamation and certificate? If he refuses, and goes back over the act of canvass performed by the secretary of state and the governor prior to that time, he would, to my mind, have an equal right to issue a second certificate upon a second canvass, if returns subsequently arriving should give him an excuse for so doing.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Suppose that when Governor Baxter came into office the secretary of state had said, "For $10,000 I will agree to strike out so many votes from one side;" would Governor Baxter have been obliged to issue his certificate on that fraudulent record, knowing it to be fraudulent? Clearly not.

Mr. HYNES. The fraud would vitiate it then, and the governor should certify that fact in justification of a second canvass, and it would then be for the House to pass upon it. But here there is no taint upon the first canvass.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate on this question has expired. The first question is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] on behalf of the minority of the committee. It will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the contested-election case from the third district of Arkansas be recommitted to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to report, upon the merits of the case, who is entitled to represent said district in this House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 81.

Mr. THOMAS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was again taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 116, nays 117, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Ashe, Atkins, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Comingo, Cook, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crocker, Crooke, Crossland, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Durham, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Field, Freeman, Giddings, Glover, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hunton, Hynes, Jewett, Kasson, Lamar, Lamison, Leach, Lynch, Magee, Marshall, McCrary, McLean, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Monroe, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Pendleton, Perry, Pierce, Potter, Ransier, Rawls, Rice, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Sener, Small, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Southard, Speer, Stanard, Standeford, Starkweather, Stone, Storm, Swann, Townsend, Vance, Waddell, Waldron, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Charles G. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Wood, Woodford, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—116.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Bass, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Fort, Foster, Frye, Gunckel, Hagans, Harrison, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kelley, Lamport, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Loughridge, Lowe, Lowndes, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McJunkin, McKee, McNulta, Moore, Negley, Orr, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Phelps, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Rainey, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Whiteley, Wilber, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—117.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Banning, Barber, Barnum, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Cain, Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Darrall, Elliott, Farwell, Garfield, Gooch, Harmer, John W. Hazelton, Hersey, Hooper, Howe, Hubbell, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lansing, Luttrell, Mitchell, Morey, Morrison, Myers, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Phillips, Poland, Pratt, Purman, Randall, Read, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sheldon, Sloss, Stephens, St. John, Taylor, Tremain, Jasper D. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Wolfe—56.

So the resolution was rejected.

During the roll-call,

Mr. NUNN stated that he was paired with Mr. ADAMS, who, if present, would vote in the affirmative, while he would vote in the negative.

Mr. WOOD. I would like to know if the gentlemen who are now voting were within the bar when the last name on the roll was called?

The SPEAKER. The rule is that they vote with the assurance they were within the bar when the last name on the roll was called.

Mr. WOOD. Some are new members, who do not know the rule.

The SPEAKER. It is repeated every roll-call.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question next recurred on the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That W. W. Wilshire is entitled prima facie to a seat in the Forty-third Congress as Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Arkansas, without prejudice to the right of Thomas M. Gunter, claiming to have been elected thereto, to contest his right to said seat upon the merits.

Mr. SPEER. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 75, noes 82.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SPEER. I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution reported by the majority of the committee.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 82.

Mr. ELDREDGE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ELDREDGE and Mr. RUSK were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 109.

Mr. LAMAR demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the adoption of the resolution reported by the majority of the committee.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 96, not voting, 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Bass, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cox, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Danford, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Dunnell, Field, Fort, Foster, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Hodges, Hoskins, Houghton, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Kelley, Lamport, Lawrence, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Lowe, Lowndes, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McJunkin, McKee, McNulta, Merriam, Moore, Negley, Orr, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Rainey, Rapier, Ray, Richmond, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stowell, Strait, Strawbridge, Sypher, Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Tyner, Wallace, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whiteley, Wilber, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodworth—118.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Ashe, Atkins, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Comingo, Cook, Cotton, Creamer, Crittenden, Crooke, Crossland, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Durham, Eames, Eldredge, Giddings, Glover, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hereford, Herndon, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hunton, Hynes, Jewett, Kasson, Magee, Marshall, McCrary, McLean, Mellish, Milliken, Mills, Monroe, Neal, Niblack, O'Brien, Hosea W. Parker, Pendleton, Perry, Pierce, Potter, Ransier, Rawls, Rice, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, William R. Roberts, Milton Sayler, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Southard, Speer, Stanard, Standeford, Stone, Storm, Swann, Townsend, Vance, Waddell, Waldron, Wells, Whitehead, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Charles G. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Wood, Woodford, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—96.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Banning, Barber, Barnum, Barrere, Barry, Begole, Berry, Cain, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Crocker, Darrall, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Freeman, Garfield, Eugene Hale, Harmer, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hersey, Hooper, Howe, Hubbell, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Loughridge, Luttrell, Lynch, Mitchell, Morey, Morrison, Myers, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Pelham, Phelps, Phillips, Poland, Pratt, Purman, Randall, Read, James C. Robinson, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sheats, Sheldon, Sloss, Small, Starkweather, Stephens, St. John, Taylor, Tremain, Jasper D. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Wolfe—75.

So the resolution was adopted.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SENER. I am paired with Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, of Iowa. If he were present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. NUNN. I am paired with Mr. ADAMS, of Kentucky. If he were here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. COX. May I ask a parliamentary question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot interrupt the roll-call for any purpose.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COX. I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. THOMAS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. COX. Was I not recognized by the Chair to make the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The Chair prefers to recognize the gentleman whom the rule says he shall recognize. He therefore recognized the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. THOMAS,] who has moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moves that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. ELDREDGE. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 63, noes 81.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BECK. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Thursday next; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr SMITH, of Ohio. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, a motion to adjourn is before the House, and the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it. Does not that motion take precedence of a motion to adjourn to a particular day?

The SPEAKER. The motion to fix a day to which the House will adjourn necessarily takes precedence of the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Pending the motion that when the House adjourns to-day it shall adjourn to meet on Thursday, would it be in order to move that when it adjourns it adjourn to meet on Friday next?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman need not multiply motions. The two already pending may be interchanged ad infinitum.

Mr. SPEER. I want to have enough material to work on for a short time. [Laughter.] If my motion is in order I desire to make it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion can be offered in the form of an amendment. Does the gentleman desire to move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. SPEER. I do. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky by striking out "Thursday" and inserting "Friday;" and I ask the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope the gentlemen on the other side of the House will consent to an adjournment till to-morrow morning. We only desire that gentlemen now absent may be here to have an opportunity to vote. That is the only purpose in these motions.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I demand the regular order. Go on with the roll-call.

The question was on agreeing to Mr. SPEER's amendment, to strike out "Thursday," in Mr. BECK's motion, and insert "Friday."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 12, nays 114, not voting 163; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Stephen A. Cobb, Henry R. Harris, Lawrence, and Marshall—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Atkins, Biery, Bradley, Bright, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cason, Cessna, John B. Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Corwin, Cotton, Crooke, Crutchfield, Dawes, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eames, Field, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Gooch, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, John B. Hawley, Joseph R. Hawley, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Holman, Hoskins, Houghton, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyde, Lawson, Lewis, Lofland, Lowe, Lowndes, Lynch, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McJunkin, McKee, McNulta, Mellish, Monroe, Moore, Orr, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Pelham, Pendleton, James H. Platt, jr., Rice, Robbins, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Ross, Rusk, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Standeford, Starkweather, Strawbridge, Sypher, Thomas, Todd, Townsend, Wallace, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whitehead, Wilber, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodford—114.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Banning, Barber, Barnum, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Burrows, Cain, Cannon, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crocker, Crossland, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, DeWitt, Donnan, Duell, Durham, Eden, Eldredge, Elliott, Farwell, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Glover, Gunckel, Hamilton, Hancock, Harmer, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, Hooper, Howe, Hubbell, Hunton, Hynes, Jewett, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Leach, Loughridge, Luttrell, Magee, Martin, Maynard, McCrary, McLean, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Mitchell, Morey, Morrison, Myers, Neal, Negley, Nesmith, Niblack, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orth, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Pike, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Rawls, Ray, Read, Richmond, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sener, Sheats, Sheldon, Sloss, Small, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Southard, Speer, Stephens, St. John, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Strait, Swann, Taylor, Thornburgh, Tremain, Tyner, Vance, Waddell, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Whitthorne, Charles W. Willard, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—163.

The SPEAKER. The roll-call shows that a quorum has not voted.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of order. The House seems to be turned into a lunch-room. [Laughter.] I wish to know of the Chair if it is in order to smoke or to eat in the Hall of Representatives?

The SPEAKER. The rules prohibit smoking, but are silent in regard to eating. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman refers to me, I will say to him that I won't eat here any more. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. There being no quorum present, only the motion to adjourn, or the motion that there be a call of the House, is now in order.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move a call of the House.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I move that the House now adjourn. [After a pause.] I will withdraw that motion.

Mr. COMINGO. I renew it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Were not the yeas and nays ordered on a motion to adjourn, before it was shown by the last vote that no quorum was voting?

The SPEAKER. They were. The Chair begs the attention of gentlemen to the fact that the question that now arises presents a singular case. A motion to adjourn was made, and the yeas and nays ordered thereon, when there was presumably a quorum in the House, as it had been shown by a vote just before taken. Then a more privileged motion was made, to fix the day to which the House should adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays were ordered. Then a motion of still higher privilege was made, to amend the motion so as to fix a different day to which the House should adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays were also ordered. Upon calling the roll upon the latter motion, no quorum voted.

The rule is specific that when less than a quorum is disclosed, there can be but two motions submitted, one to adjourn, and the other for a call of the House. Should the Chair rule that the motion to adjourn could not then be entertained, because there was pending a motion of higher privilege, it might be in the power of certain gentlemen to keep the House in session indefinitely. The motion to adjourn comes in at this point by a special rule, and is more highly privileged than motions which, with a quorum present, would really be above it, in order that the House may have the chance to disentangle itself from an embarrassment. The only motions, therefore, now in order, are the motion to adjourn and the motion for a call of the House, both of which are now pending.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and upon a division there were—ayes 50, noes 73.

Before the result of this vote was announced

Mr. COX called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, and Mr. COX were appointed.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. In view of the lateness of the hour, I suggest to gentlemen on this side of the House that we had better adjourn.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. If any debate is to be allowed on this question I desire to say a word. The gentleman expresses a desire that our side of the House should give up and adjourn. Now, I desire to fight it out on this line if it takes all night.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should now adjourn, when will this Arkansas case come up again?

The SPEAKER. The first thing after the reading of the Journal to-morrow morning.

The House again divided on the motion to adjourn, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 67, noes 74.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion for a call of the House.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. My impression is that under a new rule of the House, if no quorum is present, fifteen members can order a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. Fifteen against a larger number.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Is not that the rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that the gentleman is in error.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I simply made the inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the rule to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Why not pass the book over to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. PLATT,] and let him read it for himself. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

Any fifteen members, including the Speaker, if there be one, shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members; but where less than that number are present, a motion for a call of the House cannot be entertained.

The SPEAKER. That implies that only fifteen members are present.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Very well; I withdraw my inquiry.

The question was taken on the motion for a call of the House; and upon a division there were—ayes 64, noes 70.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, (the affirmative being one-fifth of a quorum,) and Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, and Mr. ELDREDGE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 67, noes 73.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I think I can suggest a solution of this difficulty. I believe all that members on the other side desire is one square vote to-morrow on the Arkansas case.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is all we want.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 81, noes 71.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, (one-fifth of a quorum voting in the affirmative,) and Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, and Mr. MACDOUGALL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 72, noes 70.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was again taken; and there were—yeas 87, nays 81, not voting 121; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, John B. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, and Woodworth—121.

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. HYNES said: I rise to a privileged question. I wish to know how I am recorded on the proposition to substitute the resolution of the minority for that of the majority?

The SPEAKER. That is not a privileged question.

Mr. HYNES. I supposed it was, as it is a matter affecting the record.

The SPEAKER. It does not affect the record of this vote.

Mr. HYNES. No, sir.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated; and accordingly (at six o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers, were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ARCHER: The petition of Nathan S. Gurney, for arrears of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 18, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, of Washington.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a communication of the Secretary of State, accompanying a copy of the report of Mr. John M. Thacher, who was appointed in June last as a delegate to represent the United States at the international congress which was held at Vienna in August, 1873, for the consideration of the question of the protection of patents; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication by telegraph from the common council, Board of Trade, and Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, protesting against the discontinuance of work on the public building of that city. The telegram was received several days ago, and by accident mislaid on the table. It will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, charging misconduct on the part of the Union Pacific Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, relative to improving the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Montana Territory, in relation to the protection of citizens of Deer Lodge and Missoula Counties; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the memorial of stockholders of the Wisconsin Central Railway Company, praying that the time fixed for the completion of their road be extended; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KELLY. I present the petition of J. F. Boyer and 176 others, citizens of Washington Territory, praying for the passage of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad bill. In presenting this petition, I simply wish to call attention to the object expressed in it. These gentlemen represent that they are living in a very isolated condition, remote from all the railroad systems of the United States, and they simply ask Congress to pass a bill giving to that company a sum of money which will be barely sufficient to carry the mails and the military supplies of the country, and for which they state in their petition that the company will be willing to transport not only the mails, but the troops and military supplies, and supplies for the Indian Department, in perpetuity, for all time to come. They show many reasons why the prayer of this petition should be granted. I move its reference to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TIPTON presented the petition of J. H. Humphries and other soldiers, asking for an equalization of bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of W. H. Willis and other citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of Ephraim Fairbanks, Charles A. Wright, and other citizens of Waltham, Massachusetts, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SARGENT. I present, by request from the Legislative Assembly of Utah, they having no representation on this floor, a memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives, reciting that "the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah respectfully represent that whereas a large majority of the people of this Territory are accused of disloyalty, insubordination, and other violations of the Constitution and laws of the United States; and whereas these accusations are absolutely untrue, and are made with malicious intent to procure proscriptive legislation by Congress, therefore, being anxious that legislation, if upon thorough investigation any should be deemed necessary, should be such as will conduce to the greatest good of all, we respectfully and earnestly solicit your honorable body to send to Utah a commission of investigation, with instructions to inquire into the alleged abuses in our territorial affairs, and with authority to send for persons and papers needed in the prosecution of their inquiry. And we further respectfully ask your honorable body, for the protection of what we deem the best interests of the whole people of the Territory, to suspend all action, so far as special legislation for Utah is concerned, until such time as said commission shall have had opportunity to investigate and report. And for a course so conducive to wise, and consequently beneficial, legislative action, we, your memorialists, will ever pray."

This is signed by Lorenzo Snow, president of the council; Orson Pratt, sr., speaker of the house of representatives; and by every member of the legislative council, as I understand. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary, as they have measures relating to the same subject before them.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DENNIS presented the petition of John Dix, James T. Daniel, William D. Thomas, and 78 other citizens of Maryland, praying for the establishment of a light-house on the shoal of Bishop's Head, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of Isaac Dillan, W. L. Fletcher, and other citizens of Portland, Oregon, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PRATT presented the petition of John Akley and the petition of James L. Delong, soldiers of the war of 1812, each praying to be allowed a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Elizabeth Howard, widow of Thomas H. Howard, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, protesting against the passage by the Senate of a bill that has just passed the House of Representatives for the lease to Messrs. Dupont & Co., of Wilmington, Delaware, of the "Old Lazaretto" site, near Penrose Ferry Bridge, on the bank of the river Schuylkill, Philadelphia, for a powder magazine, setting forth that that site is within half a mile of the new navy-yard at League Island, and the same distance from the wharves, docks, depot buildings, railroad terminus, and grain elevator of the new European line of steamships; and setting forth also the dangerous proximity of this powder magazine to other important business enterprises in the neighborhood of Philadelphia. I believe the bill in this case has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and I move that this petition be referred to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I also present the petition of the Wholesale Grocers' Association of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, upon the same subject, protesting against the passage of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the same committee.

Mr. SCOTT also presented a petition of citizens of Birmingham, Huntingdon County, Pennsylvania, deprecating the restoration of the duty on tea and coffee or the revival or increase of internal taxes, and praying for the repeal of section 2 of the act of June 6, 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of David Klein, reciting that he is a patentee under a foreign government of an invention touching pontoon bridges, which have been manufactured here and used, and he thinks the Government owes him for them. Although this is a claim, I think it had better go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be so referred.

Mr. HAGER presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing that Senators may be elected by a direct vote of the people; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California, relative to lands granted the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BOREMAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of William B. Matchett be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. BOREMAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of the heirs of James P. McKee be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of A. M. Wilson, a Cherokee Indian, asking pay for property taken by the Federal troops for the use of the Army in the year 1862, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

Mr. PRATT also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Jesse Connell and Barrett S. Johnston, praying to be allowed the sum of $4,265.30 for corn furnished for the use of the Army in 1862, payment for which was refused by reason of non-performance of contract, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of P. W. Whitcomb, praying compensation for services rendered as clerk of the first class while employed as laborer in the office of the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, from October 1, 1866, to April 1, 1872, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was adopted and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas B. Wallace, praying compensation for property destroyed by the Army under orders from the military commander in 1861, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 507) for the relief of Thomas B. Wallace, of Lexington, in the State of Missouri.

The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 53) for the relief of Mary E. Purnell, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Cass County, Indiana, praying that the sum of $409.87, unjustly collected of Andrew Johnson as taxes on spirits, may be refunded, reported a bill (S. No. 508) for the relief of Andrew Johnson, of Logansport, Indiana; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Henry A. Peeler, praying for relief for moneys advanced to the United States consul at Matamoras, Mexico, and expended for the relief of refugee Union men, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was adopted and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, in favor of the disposal of the Fort Smith reservation in that State and the dedication of another portion thereof to the city of Fort Smith for the benefit of the common schools of said city, reported a bill (S. No. 509) to withhold from sale a portion of the Fort Smith military reservation, in the State of Arkansas, and to prescribe the manner in which the remainder of such reservation shall be sold, and for other purposes; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 239) to withhold from sale a portion of the Fort Smith military reservation in Arkansas, and for other purposes, and the bill (S. No. 362) donating the military reservation of Fort Smith to the city of Fort Smith, Arkansas, for free schools, moved that they be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of the mayor and common council of the city of Fort Smith, praying that the military reservation at that place be donated to that city for the use of schools, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition; which was agreed to.

CONDEMNED CANNON FOR MONUMENTAL PURPOSES.

Mr. LOGAN. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 821) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the posts of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, for monumental purposes, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back with amendments, and if there is no objection I ask that it be passed now. It is merely disposing of some condemned cannon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the committee to report this bill for the first time.

Mr. LOGAN. It is a House bill, reported with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has received no such bill from the House, as the Chair is informed. It can be treated as a new Senate bill just reported, and put on the Calendar or passed.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg pardon of the Chair. It was referred to the committee as a House bill. I do not know how it got there. The amendments were made in committee, and I was ordered to report the bill back with amendments, including two other associations besides those named in the bill. I do not know how it got before our committee.

Mr. SARGENT. It may be a House bill that has not passed the House. It may be merely printed.

Mr. LOGAN. How did it get before our committee, then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It had better be treated as a Senate bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

The bill (S. No. 510) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the posts of the Grand Army of the Republic of Philadelphia, and other associations, for monumental purposes, was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver, if the same can be done without detriment to the Government, four condemned cannon and sixteen cannon-balls to each of the following-named organizations, for the purpose of ornamenting burial grounds of deceased soldiers: To the post numbered two, Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; to the post numbered five, Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; to the post numbered six, Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; to the post numbered seven, Grand Army of the Republic, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; to the post numbered eight, Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; to the post numbered ten, Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; to the post numbered seventy-one, Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; to the post numbered nineteen, Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; to the corporate authorities of the town of Winterport, State of Maine; and to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Henderson County, State of Illinois.

Mr. SARGENT. I understood by some means—I had it in my mind during the last Congress—that the number of our condemned cannon was getting very small; that the requisitions for these purposes had been very large upon the amount at the disposal of the Government, and that it was quite questionable whether any more ought to be granted. I have no doubt the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is well informed on this matter; but I should like to know whether there is any foundation for such belief, and if the quite large amount donated by this bill can be well spared.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know. I have made no inquiry about it. The bill does not require them to be given unless they can be spared. It is a mere matter of discretion with the Secretary of War, and I did not inquire whether he had them to spare or not.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it would be very proper for us to give the cannon for this purpose, whether we have them to spare or not, even if we have to go to the expense of a new cannon for every one that is donated for a purpose of that kind.

Mr. SARGENT. This provides for condemned cannon. Are we to manufacture cannon and condemn them for this operation?

Mr. ANTHONY. I would not manufacture and condemn them, but I would give all the condemned cannon.

Mr. LOGAN. Condemned cannon are of no value in the world except the price of the iron, and if we do not have them on hand, of course they are not to be distributed. The matter is left to the discretion of the Secretary of War, if he has the cannon to spare.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ANTHONY (at the request of Mr. EDMUNDS, detained by illness) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 511) for the relief of Jacob M. Smalley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CARPENTER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 512) to extend the time for completing the Wisconsin Central Railroad in Wisconsin; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 513) to provide for ascertaining losses sustained by citizens of Southern Oregon and Northern California by reason of Indian depredations in 1872 and 1873; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HAGER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 514) granting to the Sierra Iron Company a right of way through the public lands for a railroad and telegraph; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 515) to change the time for holding the terms of the United States circuit court for the southern district of Alabama; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 516) to further amend the laws granting homestead rights to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors, their widows and orphan children; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 7th instant, approved and signed the act (S. No. 216) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Fearless; and, on the 11th instant, the act (S. No. 194) in relation to the monument erected to the memory of the Chevalier de Ternay.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, after the business of the morning hour has been gone through with, I shall move to take up the House bill in regard to the centennial exhibition.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In that connection I desire to remind the honorable Senator and the Senate that, as soon as the subject-matter now before the Senate passes from its consideration, the Committee on Appropriations will feel bound to urge upon the consideration of the Senate the naval appropriation bill, reported some ten or fifteen days ago, and of which they gave notice at that time.

Mr. CAMERON. I am sure my friend from Maine will not interfere with my taking up this bill during the morning hour. That will not interfere with the other bill, I trust.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I shall endeavor, out of the greatest possible feeling of courtesy to my honorable friend, not to interfere with his bill unnecessarily; but I wish to take due caution that his bill does not interfere with mine. My honorable friend has such facility for getting before the Senate matters that he desires, that he needs to be watched.

Mr. CAMERON. I have now given notice of what I shall attempt to do to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In the morning hour?

Mr. CAMERON. In the morning hour.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That will not interfere with my bill.

LIQUOR-TRAFFIC COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the Secretary will report the Calendar.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Finance reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following in lieu thereof:

That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission of five persons, neither of whom shall be the holder of any office of profit or trust in the General or a State government. The said commissioners shall be selected solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation, and shall hold office until their duties shall be accomplished, but not to exceed one year. It shall be their duty to investigate the alcoholic liquor traffic in its economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects, in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people; and also inquire and take testimony as to the practical results of license and restrictive legislation for the prevention of intemperance in the several States.

SEC. 2. That the said commissioners shall serve without salary; shall be authorized to employ a secretary at a reasonable compensation, not to exceed $2,000 per year, which, with the necessary expenses incidental to said investigation, of both the secretary and commissioners, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon vouchers to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the amount necessary is hereby appropriated. It shall be the further duty of said commissioners to report the result of their investigation, and the expenses attending the same, to the President, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, I did not interpose the other morning in order to prevent the immediate consideration of this bill, but only because I wished whenever the bill should be acted upon by the Senate to have a call of the yeas and nays.

The bill is in accordance, in its character, with the tendency of the times, the gathering into the Federal jurisdiction of all State functions and all matters of State police. As being of that character, I am opposed to it, and I consider it my duty whenever any of these measures, which have been so frequent for the past few years, shall be brought to the consideration of the Senate, at least to interpose so far as to ask the Senate to take thought what they are doing, and before the precedents in this direction become more numerous.

We are to make investigation with regard to a traffic in connection with "pauperism, crime, social vice, public health, general welfare," matters which, in the very theory of our system, belong to the functions of the States, are there best considered, and there measures best calculated to be adopted to promote the opposite of the evils which are apprehended from the traffic ought to be inquired after.

There are a great many petitions on our table in reference to this subject, and asking for this commission. They are petitions, as a whole, from the best and purest minded of the citizens of the United States, who mean right, who mean the welfare of humanity, who desire to promote virtue, but who, in their anxiety to bring about these great results, fail to consider that, in the mode in which they are pursuing them, they may be in danger of inflicting even fundamental evils upon our whole system of society.

Now, sir, all that I ask is that when the question is taken upon this bill it may be taken by yeas and nays. I want to record my vote against every bill of the tendency which I consider is attached to this bill, and to which I have alluded.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. President, I have no disposition to discuss the question at all. I do not understand whether my friend put his objection on the ground of want of power on the part of Congress to pass such a bill as this, or upon the ground of expediency. I submit that we are here to legislate for the public welfare. I submit that the Constitution of the United States was given to us for the life of the nation, and not for its death. I submit that it is a charter of life, and not a charter of death. I submit that this Congress is in the line of its duty when it is collecting material that shall assist us to legislate for the public welfare. If it be true that prosperity and happiness, and good society and order and quiet, are better as promotive of this national life, are better as promotive of this general welfare, than pauperism and crime and social evil, then we are but in the line of our duty when we pass this bill. We are asked to do so, as has been suggested, by the best and purest minds of this land and nation. It is a simple commission of inquiry to report to us the facts and the statistics as they shall gather them; and when they shall be before us we are to determine what legislation shall follow, if any.

There are many reasons why it is proper and just in my judgment that we should have this report. There never has been such a general report to Congress. We need it in connection with our revenue laws; we need it for numberless reasons that I shall not now attempt to point out. I suggest that there is no constitutional difficulty. I suggest that this is demanded by the best men of the land. I suggest that this is demanded by the best interests of the nation.

Mr. CONKLING. Did this bill give rise to the objection or to the consideration mentioned by the Senator from Connecticut, I should feel bound to pause before voting for it. Without going into a general statement of my reasons, I make one remark in reply to the Senator from Connecticut. The whole function of the bill is to institute an inquiry, nothing more. Obviously the Senate, like every parliamentary body, has a right, for purposes of legislation, to inform itself. It has a right to make inquiry touching any matter or thing in respect of which it needs information; and no limit, no boundary to this power, or to its proper exercise, occurs to me until you come to a case of private character and private rights; in such a case you may violate the true principles of constitutional liberty, as I fear these principles have been violated sometimes by one or the other of the Houses of Congress. When, however, you are inquiring in the abstract, inquiring for general information merely, whether it is more or less likely to be useful, as a question of power, I submit to the Senator from Connecticut there can be no doubt of the absolute prerogative of this or any other parliamentary body.

How does this inquiry differ from the ordinary inquiries continually directed by resolutions, which are matters of course? Simply in the fact that it intrusts the inquiry to persons not members of this body. It authorizes the creation of a commission, which is to serve without hire or reward, except that paid to its secretary. It provides that this commission shall proceed to obtain certain information. I cannot see how such a bill can be, in the estimation of my honorable friend from Connecticut, one of those, of which I admit there are many, open to the doubt he expresses. If we can inquire by a committee of our own, we can inquire in the way now proposed. If the information will not fall in its practical use within any field of legislation, then the inquiry in one sense would be idle and superfluous. But that does not touch the question of our power to make it. But in fact every man must see, whether his attention has been specially directed to the evils of intemperance or not, that the facts aimed at are many-sided, useful in all directions in augmenting that fund of knowledge on which we must rely in discreet, conservative, and wholesome legislation.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Only a word. In the remarks which I made a few moments ago I was careful not to deny the power of Congress to enact a law of this kind. I stated my opposition to be based upon the tendency developed in this bill, similar to the tendency exhibited in many similar bills and fully developed in others, of drawing those subjects which appropriately are within the jurisdiction of the States into the cognizance of the Federal Government. I wished to meet that tendency in the outset, for the bill is based upon the multitudinous petitions which have been laid upon our tables, asking us to create a commission of this kind, the result of whose inquiry was anticipated to be the enactment of a law by Congress regulating or prohibiting the alcoholic traffic in the country, a matter which I believe at present nearly every Senator would say belongs especially to the State jurisdiction. I say "nearly every Senator," for I have heard Senators argue upon this floor that by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution the Congress of the United States, without the previous action or non-action of any State, is empowered to enact any law for the protection of life, or liberty, or property, and the Senator on my left [Mr. SCHURZ] suggests "or for the pursuit of happiness." That was substantially the claim that was made here upon another bill, and the passage of that bill in the constitutional aspect was urged upon us upon the constitutional theory which I have mentioned. According to the argument made when that bill was before the Senate, we are empowered by the fourteenth amendment to enact such a law as the petitioners have asked for upon whose application this preliminary bill of inquiry has been brought into the Senate.

I would say to the Senator from New York, it is not because I discern the want of power to pass this particular bill, but in reference to these assaults upon the Constitution, which have become, as I said, so frequent of late years, the safest rule, in my judgment, is obsta principiis; and that is the reason why I desire the yeas and nays upon the present bill, to record my vote against it.

Mr. TIPTON. I remember that there is a tendency in the country on the part of the people of the States to legislate on this question—the traffic in intoxicating liquors; and there is a tendency to legislate in the direction of prohibition as to the sale—perhaps not at the present time as to the manufacture. I remember that the General Government is collecting perhaps $90,000,000 as revenue from intoxicating liquors in the United States. Under these circumstances I can very easily see the propriety of an investigation in which the Government is interested, and in which the people of the States are interested; and shall vote accordingly for the investigation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I am so much in sympathy with the general objects of this bill that I should hesitate to raise any question of authority in this investigation, unless it were very obvious. This bill proposes "to investigate the liquor traffic, in its economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects, in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people." I agree with the Senator from Connecticut that most of these subjects peculiarly belong to the people of the States, are within their province, and more intimately relate to the people of the States. At the same time it is pretty obvious that some of the relations of the alcoholic traffic touch the legislation in which we are from time to time engaged, such as the levying of taxes and the like; and therefore I can see that the Congress of the United States might very well be employed in the investigation of the traffic in alcoholic liquors, in which the Government at the present time, under its policy, is so large and potential an agent, in its relations to pauperism, crime, and the general welfare of the country at large.

But, Mr. President, I desire to make this observation in regard to this class of investigations: I think they are, as a general proposition, a failure. They are unreliable; they are unsatisfactory; and it seems to me that they are a departure from the usual methods adopted by Congress to prepare itself for its own legislation. It is obvious enough that all this information can be gathered through several of the standing committees of this body with very much less expense, with the same facility which any commission would have, and very much more reliable than can be expected under the terms of this bill. If the Committee on Finance had the leisure, and would adopt the necessary measures to inquire into this subject themselves, they would probably be able to produce very much more satisfactory results to the Senate of the United States than can be expected from a commission such as this bill contemplates. What do we expect from this bill? It authorizes the appointment of three commissioners, neither of whom is to be an officer of the General or of a State government. That is well enough, so that they shall be under no influence of an official character from either. They are expected to be competent men, I suppose, to investigate this subject; and they are to be asked to do it without any compensation whatever. Does anybody suppose we are likely to get any very valuable service in that direction? Does anybody know of a man anywhere so out of employment, so in lack of employment, so patriotic, or so devoted to these subjects, that he, for a whole year, as contemplated by this bill, can devote himself assiduously to them, or who could be really expected to devote himself assiduously to this duty, so that at the end of the twelve months we should have anything here as the result of this commission that would be valuable to us? I hardly think we have any right to expect any such thing as that; and, on the other hand, I hardly think it is quite becoming for Congress, who assume that this is a matter of so much importance as to raise a commission upon, to ask gentlemen of character and respectability and intelligence to do it as a matter of favor to Congress, or of grace to the American people, or as a contribution of any description whatever, without compensation.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, I will say that those who represent both sides of this question—because there are two sides to it—have desired and urged that this commission should be without compensation. The Committee on Finance heard gentlemen of antagonistic views on the question, not only the manufacturers of spirituous liquors and the manufacturers of beer, but also those who believed that all such manufacture should be prohibited. Both sides desire that the commission should serve without pay.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am not going to argue the question. I only make an objection which is in the line of the general objection I have to all these commissions. We have committees of the Senate, committees of the House, whose business it is to furnish us with the evidence and the facts, to enable us to act understandingly on matters that are brought before Congress. We should confine ourselves to them. If this is outside of that, and we wish to enlighten the general sense of the community without any reference to legislation, that is another thing; but upon the assumption that we intend to gather information to legislate upon, then I think it belongs to the standing committees of the Senate.

My object in rising, however, was, more than anything else, to suggest that there should be a limitation of the expense of this inquiry. The bill provides that, while the commissioners shall serve without salary, they shall be authorized to employ a secretary at a reasonable compensation, not to exceed $2,000 a year, and that all the necessary expenses incidental to such investigation, of both the secretary and commissioners, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, on vouchers to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. It is a little unusual to make an appropriation of money so unlimited and unrestricted, and on so uncertain a basis. I would, therefore, ask the Senator who has the bill in charge whether it is not practicable for him to name some sum within which the expense will probably fall?

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection, if the Senator from Maine will mention some sum. I think a sum might be mentioned.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would mention the sum of $10,000.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would have no objection to double that, if it was necessary. I shall be glad if we get off with twice ten thousand dollars.

Mr. WRIGHT. Do I understand the Senator from Maine to move an amendment?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I shall be very happy if it can be brought within $10,000. I mention that sum. If any gentleman chooses to name a lower sum, very well.

Mr. WRIGHT. Where would the Senator propose his amendment to come in?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On the eighth line of the second section, after the word "amount," insert "not to exceed $10,000."

Mr. CONKLING. Unless I interrupt the Senator from Maine, I suggest that we had better say $5,000 than $10,000. The Senator from Maine seems to wonder that anybody is willing, without compensation, to perform such a service; he asked whether persons can be found to give their time for nothing? I know such men. I can name many among my own constituents, men who, like Mr. Bergh, "without money, and without price," are willing to devote a large part of their lives to the good of their fellow-men. Such men want no pecuniary compensation; they want nothing in this bill that looks like it. There is a provision that the secretary is to be paid not to exceed $2,000 a year. No other expenses are involved, except those of printing. When they come to print, whether the printing shall be done at the Government Printing Office, or done upon their own order, will be a question; and to provide for that, it might be very well to add $3,000, which would be $5,000 in all. I think of no other expense.

Mr. SHERMAN. Traveling.

Mr. CONKLING. They do not want traveling expenses.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Allow me to suggest that it is provided in the bill that the commissioners may "also inquire and take testimony as to the practical results of license and restrictive legislation for the prevention of intemperance in the several States." That, I suppose, would lead to incurring expense.

Mr. CONKLING. What sort of expense does the Senator mean? Witness fees?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly; the taking of testimony.

Mr. CONKLING. That cannot be the design of this. If it is to go so far as to enable them to bring witnesses by compulsion, to enforce the attendance of witnesses by process, you must have machinery. The bill is wholly inadequate for such a purpose, and does not contemplate it at all. It is not to be an inquisition, not a forcible proceeding, to drag men before this commission to testify, or by subpœna duces tecum to bring their books and papers. The idea is that those will be selected by the President whose condition in life will no doubt be such that they can afford to give, not perhaps, as the Senator from Maine suggested, a whole year, a solid twelvemonth, to the neglect of all other things, but so much time within a year as shall be necessary to group together and report the facts on both sides of the question of the use and traffic of liquor.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Will the Senator from New York state what is the meaning of the phrase "take testimony?" I agree with him, it does not imply compulsory process. But does it not imply that they will take the testimony of persons who will volunteer to give their evidence on the one side or the other?

Mr. CONKLING. I think the Senator and I would agree if we were agreed as to the meaning of "testimony." If he uses it in its technical sense, that the witnesses are to be sworn and examined and cross-examined, I do not so understand it. If he means testimony in the general sense—statements, documents, statistics, the records of courts, everything which goes to show the gain and loss, and all the effects of making, selling, and drinking spirits—I think it means that. But I submit that there is no occasion for any provision for expense except for the secretary, and a conditional provision, perhaps. If the printing shall be made by the commissioners, I would say $5,000; and if they want more, they can ask for it at the proper time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the proposition is that these gentlemen shall sit in their offices and write essays on this subject, I can understand that no expense is to be incurred; but if, as this commission contemplates, there is to be a thorough examination of the whole subject in all the relations which are specified in this bill; and if, moreover, they are to "inquire and take testimony as to the practical results of license and restrictive legislation for the prevention of intemperance in the several States"—if they intend to do all that, they are to travel all over this country. If they do their duty man-fashion, if they do it with the slightest degree of fidelity, if they are to accumulate testimony which will be of any consequence to the public interest in forming a public judgment or a public sense on this overshadowing question of questions, they have got to go about; they have got to consider in my own State, for instance—for they are directed to that end—what has been the result of the Maine law, what has been the result of the restrictive or prohibitory principle of the Maine law in that State, how it has operated, whether it has been a failure or a success, whether it is practicable or not; and testimony is contemplated to be taken on that very question, and as to the States that have adopted the license principle; and how about the movement that is in the West now, stirring some of those States very profoundly I perceive, and the legislation of those States, some of it restrictive, some of it prohibitory, some of it license. All of these things are to be examined, and no more interesting or important question can agitate the public at the present time than this identical question. And now the idea of forming a commission upon a subject so vast, so comprehensive, so far-reaching in many directions, and asking them to work without salary and without the payment of their expenses, their traveling fees, and all that, it seems to me is to belittle the whole thing, and to send them out under such circumstances that they will be expected to do nothing more than write essays on this subject on such theories and speculations as their individual observation may enable them to do.

I hope, therefore, that not less than $10,000 will be appropriated in order to make this thing efficient; and I shall be greatly disappointed, if these men perform their duty at all in the sense in which I think this bill will direct them, if they do not pay out twice that much; and I would be willing to quadruple it if these men would perform the high duty which is implied in this. I should think if you appropriated out of the Treasury $50,000 or $100,000 for a thorough investigation of this whole subject, which should be wise and thorough, no better service could be performed at this time for the American people. I should hope, therefore, if we do anything at all, we shall allow these men such a sum as will enable them to enter upon their duties with some proper idea of usefulness.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. WRIGHT. If there is no disposition to debate this question further, I submit we may as well take the vote.

Mr. SARGENT. If there is any hope of taking the vote soon I shall not object; otherwise I shall have to object.

Mr. WRIGHT. I shall not insist if there is any disposition to protract the debate. If there is no such disposition, let us take the vote.

Mr. SCHURZ. I wish to say something.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I feel the importance of this subject, and am disposed to submit a few remarks upon it. I am in favor of the bill, but wish to speak to some extent.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will not press the request.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 492) to make persons charged with crimes and offenses competent witnesses;

A bill (H. R. No. 933) to provide for the holding of terms of the district court of the United States for the western district of Missouri, at Springfield, in said State;

A bill (H. R. No. 1592) limiting the time for prosecutions and convictions in certain criminal offenses;

A bill (H. R. No. 1593) relating to the punishment of the crime of manslaughter;

A bill (H. R. No. 1594) for the punishment of extortion by officers or persons acting under the authority of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 2076) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue the use of the cutter Relief as a revenue-cutter, and use said vessel for a boarding station in Mobile Bay; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2078) for the benefit of occupying claimants.

The message further announced that the House had passed a resolution for printing five thousand copies of the report of John W. Woodworth, supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service, for the year 1873; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 1940) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by James McDonnell, a warrant officer in the United States Navy, of a present from the King of Italy;

A bill (H. R. No. 483) to authorize the cancellation of an export bond for a portion of the distilled spirits of John S. Miller, on board of bonded cars of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1041) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, is before the Senate as the unfinished business.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin on my left [Mr. HOWE] suggested last night an amendment to the amendment of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I hold in my hand, and had then upon my desk, an amendment that precisely covers the case in point; and as all the amendments will, I suppose, go to the Committee on Finance in case the motion prevails to recommit the bill, I should like to have this amendment of mine read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan gives notice of an amendment which he intends to propose at a future stage of this bill, and asks to have it read for information. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall retire and destroy one dollar in legal-tender notes for each and every additional issue of bank-notes, either from the sale of bonds or the receipts from revenue.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, with that amendment, which I have no doubt my honorable friend from Pennsylvania will accept, I shall vote for his proposition; without that, I shall not vote for it; and I propose as briefly as possible to give my reasons for the vote I shall cast upon this subject.

I believe now, as I stated the other day, that the proposition I then suggested is entirely feasible and desirable, to wit, to give notice of an early day when this nation will resume the payment of its notes in coin. I believed then and I believe now that our bonds for $100,000,000 could be negotiated and a favorable loan made that would enable us, with the accumulation of the coming year in our Treasury, to resume absolutely at as early a day certainly as the 1st of July, 1875, or even as early as the 1st of January, 1875; and I likewise believe that it would be the greatest measure of relief ever offered to this nation, or that has been proposed, and that it would result in permanent benefit to all classes of people in all the States. But, sir, there seems to be a sort of rabid mania against the name of coin on the part of certain parties in this body; and although I deem my proposition entirely feasible, although I believe it could be carried out, and ought to be carried out, I do not believe it can be carried at this time through this body; and therefore I shall not press it at this time, but shall give my reasons for voting for the proposition I have just submitted, which is a step in the right direction. In 1865 I advocated upon this floor the substitution of bank-notes for greenbacks as a step toward the resumption of specie payments, and a rapid step toward that resumption. I am now simply advocating what I advocated then, to wit, the withdrawal of greenbacks and the substitution of national-bank notes.

Mr. President, I have had a good deal of experience in the course of my life in panics and in crashes. As a business man, I went through the panic and crash of 1837, of 1847, and of 1857; and although not actively engaged in business, I have watched with great interest the crash and the panic of 1873.

Michigan has had a very valuable experience in the way of inflation, of panics, and of failures. In 1836 the Legislature of Michigan, then a young State of but one year's growth, authorized the issue of what was known as the Michigan five-million loan. The negotiation of a loan of $5,000,000 by that young State was effected, and with the proceeds the State proposed to build three parallel lines of railroad from Lake Michigan to the eastern waters of the State. It was nearly twenty years too early for all those roads to be built; but to-day every one of them is completed, and has been for years. As the country grew, as population increased, as wealth was accumulated, the necessity for the construction of those roads became apparent, and the capital of the people accomplished what the young State of Michigan failed to do.

In 1837, while these improvements were going on, there was a failure on the part of the Morris Canal Banking Company, I think, to pay the five-million loan. They paid something over two millions, and suspended, and the State of Michigan was left without money and without much credit. She had already negotiated $5,000,000. True, a portion of it had not been received, and she had not much credit to carry on these works; but the cry went forth, "More money; more money; the laboring classes must have more money; our internal improvements will stop unless we have more money."

The State of Michigan undertook to furnish more money. She granted charters to a large number of State banks, such as the Bank of Pontiac, the Bank of Clinton, the Bank of Ann Arbor, and so on—the number I cannot tell; but they did not furnish enough money. They wanted "more money;" and in order to make brief work, and the remedy efficient, she passed a general banking law, known as the "wild-cat law," authorizing everybody everywhere to start a bank and furnish more money. Well, sir, they started banks. There was the Farmers' Bank of Sandstone, the Bank of Brest, the Bank of Gibraltar, and banks where there is nothing left now but a barn, and no windows even in that. They started a hundred banks that furnished "more money." In process of time they got money enough of that kind. If the banks ever paid anything I never heard of it. They were to be started on coin, and they took kegs of nails and broken lass, with a little coin on top, and brought the inspector of banks in and started banks upon these kegs of nails with a little coin scattered on top, which were carted off the next day to some other place to start another bank, and then they ground out "more money" there.

After the failure of these banks the cry was still, "More money; we must have more money; the country is suffering for more money." The cry was responded to, and more money was furnished. The treasury of the State of Michigan, already owing $5,000,000, undertook to furnish more money, and the State issued treasury notes ad libitum, and the "more-money" men got more money until the value of the State treasury notes, which have been paid to the last dollar at par, ran down to thirty-seven cents on the dollar; and almost every city in the State, including the city of Detroit, responded to the cry of "more money," and issued shin-plasters; and individuals, realizing that "more money" was needed, issued shin-plasters. So the State of Michigan was flooded with more money.

Well, sir, you can see at a glance that the State of Michigan needed more money. We had as a people been speculating almost to a man. It was not confined to the merchant, the banker, the man of wealth; but the mechanic, the farmer, the laborer, every man who could buy a piece of property of any sort, kind, or description, bought it, ran in debt, laid out a town, sold the lots, gave a mortgage, and then wanted "more money" to pay that mortgage.

When the collapse came it was absolute; there was no mistake about it; the collapse was perfect. Then the people of Michigan had enough of "more money;" and when our constitutional convention met, as it did a few years later, they put into the constitution a clause prohibiting the Legislature forever from chartering a bank or affording the means of furnishing "more money;" and the people acquiesced in it. They had had enough of the "more-money" cry; and for twenty-five years there was no more cry in the State of Michigan for irredeemable money. When you passed your national banking law we had in the State of Michigan just $200,000 of banking capital for the whole State; and that was a little bank in Detroit acting under an old charter. There were a few private banks scattered here and there, private individual brokers, but there were no banks of issue in the State, and we were compelled to send to the right hand and the left, and everywhere, to get money; to get good money if we could, but money we must have; and we found the place at last where we could get more money, and the State of my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] furnished it.

Sir, there is a generation rising since 1841, 1842, and 1843 who forget the crash of those years, but you will not find a man in the whole State of Michigan, who went through that crash, who wants any more irredeemable money; and I thought that Indiana had got pretty well filled with irredeemable money. The State of Indiana, not profiting by the experience of the State of Michigan, in 1853, some fourteen years afterward, having forgotten all about Michigan wild-cat, thought its people wanted more money, and so passed a general banking law, authorizing anybody to furnish more money who could buy a paper mill and start a shop. They gave some sort of security, but the security, I believe, was not quite as good as that which purported to be furnished by the Michigan wild-cats, for that was coin. They gave some sort of security in Indiana, and they furnished money known familiarly all over the West—my colleague will remember it—as "red-dog." Was not that it?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I do not remember now.

Mr. CHANDLER. We had no other name for it in Michigan. It was generally from 10 to 20 and sometimes 25 per cent. below any other money, and I do not know that it was worth near as much as that, but it circulated because we had not anything else to circulate, and we used to send it over by the wagon-load to Chicago, and sell it for what we could get and buy anything that Chicago had to sell. But we got more money. I thought the constituents of my honorable friend from Indiana had had enough of that description of money, but it seems they have not. They want "more money" still. Well, sir, I hope it will not be of the red-dog kind. That was the only name known for it in our State, as wild-cat was for yours. I hope my friend from Indiana will take no offense when I put it after the mistake the State of Michigan had made.

Mr. PRATT. Not at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. But I have not heard anything of this red-dog currency for some years, and it is very possible that the generation now on the stage have forgotten even the red-dog experience of Indiana.

Now, Mr. President, the impression seems to have gone abroad that the losses from the failure of banks and from the discount and losses upon bank circulation fall upon the wealthy classes. Nothing is further from the truth. The losses to which I have referred did not fall upon the moneyed men of the State of Michigan, the men who were in sound condition. They fell upon the laboring man, the farmer, and the mechanic. They fell upon the men who could least afford to submit to the loss. So it is now. Why, sir, our values are fixed by a foreign market, and in coin. There is not a bushel of corn or a bushel of wheat raised in Indiana, or Illinois, or Michigan, the value of which is not fixed by the foreign value in coin of that particular article. When you enhance the cost of production by an inferior currency you put that loss upon the producer, and the loss falls not upon the wealthy man, but upon the laborer and the producer. Money will take care of itself all over the world. If it is not safe in this country, it will find a country where it is safe, and it will go to that country, no matter where that may be. Hence capital qreuires no protection whatever from this body; money will take care of itself; but the poor man, the laboring man, the man who submits to all the losses from this depreciated currency, is the man who suffers all the pain and all the injury that are inflicted by this false legislation. Why, sir, it is rumored that even the gentleman who possesses such great wealth in this city removed a large portion of his money to Europe, where it would bring him probably no more than 3 per cent. interest, because he did not consider it safe in the District of Columbia or elsewhere in this country. So it always has been. The wealthy men of the South during the rebellion bought cotton and transferred their funds where they would be safe. My honorable friend, the senior Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] will inform you that he never lost a dollar by all the depreciated currency that was circulated in the South during the rebellion. It was the poor men who suffered. The rich men took care of themselves. So it is all over this nation, and all over the world. In case of a loss, it falls upon the laboring masses and the poor men, and not upon the rich.

In 1847 the crash, if such it may be termed, was very severe, and there were some failures; but there was no inflation then, and the effect of the crash and the panic of 1847 soon passed away, leaving scarcely a wave in its track.

In 1857 the crash was more severe and the losses and failures greater. In 1857 we had this unlimited amount of "red-dog money," which expanded things considerably. There was no difficulty in borrowing any amount of money you wanted to borrow, but it was not very good when you got it; and the crash of 1857 was infinitely worse than that of 1847, and about equal to that of 1873.

Now, sir, we come to the crash of 1873. On the 15th day of September, 1873, this nation was in a more prosperous condition than perhaps it had been for the last twenty-five years. Every branch of industry was prosperous, every interest of the people was prosperous; but in a day, at the drop of the ball at twelve o'clock on the 16th of September, the panic struck. What produced this tremendous panic and crash in this great and prosperous country? It was over-speculation in railroad securities. It was by men undertaking to do what it was utterly impossible for them to do, to wit, for individuals to float untold millions by their own credit; and when the people became alarmed for fear the crash would come, the crash came, and there was no salvation from it. But, sir, on that very self-same day the nation was more prosperous than it had been for the last twenty years in all its interests—business, banking, and every other. That crash ought not to have extended one yard beyond Wall street and the few producers of railroad iron who were manufacturing for these defunct railroads. But, sir, the panic was so great that it spread until it became universal, and values sank until there seemed to be no bottom, and everybody was affected throughout the length and breadth of this broad land.

But, Mr. President, that panic was of short duration. Many failures took place, and particularly among stock and railroad operators; but the main business of the country still went on with a few notable exceptions. Some manufactories stopped for the want of money; others stopped for the want of credit. The men that had been issuing their paper without intending to pay it, issuing millions of dollars of paper which they knew they could not meet at maturity, trusting in luck to meet their obligations—those men could not borrow money; their lines are full everywhere; nobody will loan them money; but, sir, upon undoubted security money is to-day cheaper than it has been at any time for the last twenty years. These great borrowers, without the expectation of paying at maturity, are to-day all out of the market. No man will loan money to a person who does not pay at maturity. Every man that desires to borrow money for legitimate business can borrow it to-day cheaper than he could borrow it for the last twenty years, as I shall show you in a very few moments when I receive the paper which I have sent for.

Sir, you may legislate for this class who have over-speculated, you may legislate for the benefit of the men who have built factories, built steamboats, built mills, bought mills, bought mines, bought everything for sale, and given their paper knowing they could not meet it unless they could borrow the money over again; you may legislate them $100,000,000 or $1,000,000,000, and you will not help them in the slightest degree; but for all legitimate purposes, for all strictly business paper that is known as gilt-edged, money is not only cheaper in the market of New York, but it is cheaper in every money-center throughout these United States, than it has been for a long time. You may go to Detroit, to Buffalo, to Rochester, to Cleveland, to Saint Louis, to Chicago, anywhere, and you will find that capital is seeking prime A No. 1 paper at the very lowest rate of interest. Here is the report from New York for yesterday afternoon at 2 o'clock, taken from the New York Evening Post, considered a very reliable authority. The Post's financial article says:

> Early sales of gold were at 12⅝, and since 11.30 o'clock sales have been at 12¾ @ 12⅞. On gold loans the rates have been 4 @ 5 per cent. Foreign exchange is dull. * * * The money market continues easy, with 4 @ 5 per cent. as the ruling quotation for call loans, 3 to 6 being exceptional rates.

That is to say, on very choice securities they could borrow money at 3 per cent., and on not so good securities they would be charged 6 per cent.

> Government bonds are firm at yesterday's advance. Southern State bonds are at the board strong for Tennessees and Missouris, and heavy for Virginias. The stock market has been steady to strong and dull. Prime mercantile paper is quoted at 5½ to 6½ per cent.

Prime mercantile paper, Mr. President, is paper that is undoubted, and that is paid at maturity and that will not be renewed. Prime mercantile paper is selling at from 5½ to 6½ per cent., and I have never known within the last twenty-five years prime mercantile paper quoted below 6 per cent. in any quotations, nor do I believe it has ever been less than that.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Most certainly.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to ask the Senator from Michigan if he believes a merchant in Chicago, Saint Louis, or farther west, could go to New York with prime paper—paper that would be prime at home—and get it discounted for the price he named?

Mr. CHANDLER. They offered to discount it for me for 6 per cent.

Mr. CAMERON. They would do it for my friend, for he is one of those people who issue nothing but gilt-edged paper.

Mr. CHANDLER. Any concern of undoubted credit, that gives gilt-edged paper anywhere, that they are sure will be paid, can obtain discount at those rates in New York to-day. That is what I mean to say.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator will allow me just one word more, I will say that when money is cheapest in New York it is an evidence that business is not prosperous in the country. Money is loaned on short loans, at call generally, and of course at low rates; but when business is not prosperous there is very little to be had.

Mr. CHANDLER. My friend did not understand me. This is business paper, which is given at fixed dates, to be paid at maturity. That is the paper I was quoting.

Mr. CAMERON. Exactly; and I have had some experience in business paper.

Mr. CHANDLER. So have I.

Mr. CAMERON. I know you have; and it is that sort of paper which, I repeat again, is evidence of want of prosperity and want of facilities for business purposes abroad. In times when business is not prosperous the money gets to New York, and then it becomes a matter for speculation entirely. It is better to take 1 per cent. per annum, to make it an extreme case, than to let it lie idle. They must make something out of it, and they loan it for a day or two or a month at a time. The moment business becomes prosperous again, then that money is wanted in the country, not in the marts of trade so much as throughout the great manufacturing and agricultural districts of the country. There is where they need facilities, and there is the place where they cannot get them at the present day.

Mr. CHANDLER. If my honorable friend had been in his seat when I commenced he would have understood my meaning better; but as he was not in I will simply inform him that I was talking about business paper when he came in and interrupted me. Of course he knows as well as I do what business paper is; but as he has undertaken to give an explanation of what stock business is, I propose to pay a little attention now to stocks, with his permission.

Mr. CAMERON. I suppose I ought to beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly not.

I hold in my hand, Mr. President, the prices of stocks in the city of New York on the 15th day of September, or the day before the panic struck; on the 30th day of October, or about the middle of the panic; and on the 14th day of February, or last Saturday. When I had these lists made out, Saturday's paper was the last paper I had to refer to, and I presume, although this paper is dated the 16th, it means last Saturday, the latest date I have been able to possess myself of.

From the 15th day of September to the 14th day of February is a period of five months lacking one day. I give you the quotations of the self-same stocks on those days.

United States new 5 per cent. stocks on the 15th of September, the day before the panic struck, sold for 112¼ cents on the dollar; on the 30th day of October they sold for 108, and on the 14th day of February for 112⅜. The five-twenties of May and November sold on the 15th of September for 115⅝; on the 30th of October for 108; and on the 14th of February for 120, or 4½ per cent. higher than they sold for the day before the panic occurred in the city of New York and the nation. The five-twenties payable in January and July sold on the 15th of September for 116¼; on the 30th of October for 112½; and on the 14th of February for 120½, or 3⅞ per cent. higher than the day before the panic.

American gold sold on the 15th of September at 111; on the 30th October at 108½; on the 14th February at 112⅜, or 1½ per cent. higher than it sold for before the panic.

Then we come to the interest-paying stocks. New York Central and Hudson River Railroad stock sold on the 15th of September at 103¾; on the 30th of October at 81½; on the 14th of February 103⅜, or 1 per cent. higher than the day before the panic. Pacific Mail, which is rather a fancy stock, sold at 43¾ on the 15th of September; at 26⅞ on the 30th of October; at 43 on the 14th of February, which is only ¼ per cent. less than before the panic. This is a fancy stock which I believe does not pay dividends; but I am trying now to follow the dividend-paying stocks. Saint Paul, common, sold on the 15th day of September at 46½; on the 30th of October at 22⅜; and on the 14th of February at 47½, or 1⅛ per cent. higher than the day before the panic.

But I will not detain the Senate longer on this point than to give the quotation of one other stock. Harlem sold for 128⅞ on the 15th of September; for 101¼ on the 30th of October, and for 132¾ on the 14th of February, 1874, about 3 per cent. higher than before the panic began.

There is one other stock to which I wish to call the attention of the body, because it is strictly a fancy stock, never having paid a dividend, and I presume it never will pay a dividend as long as the world stands; that is the Union Pacific Railroad. It sold on the 15th of September at 24¼. It is a speculative stock, its bonds are below par; and its stocks sold on the 15th of September at 24¼ cents, on the 30th of October at 15⅝, on the 14th of February, 1874, at 35¼ cents on a dollar, or nearly 40 per cent. more than it brought before the panic struck, and more than 125 per cent. above what it brought at the lowest panic price; and there is a purely fancy stock.

So it is running through all the list of speculative stocks. You can scarcely find one in all the list of the New York stock market that is not quoted higher than it was before the panic struck on the 15th of September. Why, sir, speculation is running wild in the city of New York; and, as I showed you a moment ago, business paper, strictly business paper, that is good, is selling lower than it has sold for at any time in the last twenty years. These are my advices all over the United States, in every money center, that strictly gilt-edged, good paper is sought everywhere at lower rates of interest than have usually been charged.

But, Mr. President, there is another feature. It has been intimated here that the increase of our circulation from the issue of the $44,000,000 reserve may have had something to do with this increased prosperity. Sir, let us look at the figures on the Saturday before this Congress met, to wit, on the 29th day of November, and compare them with the figures of the self-same stocks on the 14th day of February, and you will find to your sorrow that while you have increased your circulation $26,000,000 or $27,000,000, you have diminished your purchasing power by more than three times that amount in the value of your money. Let us take those two dates.

If I had had more time I could have reduced what I have to say into a smaller space, but I have only had a day or two to consider it, and it is a work of labor to go over these figures. I have worked at them ever since I left here yesterday afternoon, and I hoped to bring my remarks within ten minutes, but I cannot do it. It simply requires time to do that.

On the 29th of November, the Saturday before Congress met, your new five per cents sold at 109½, and on Saturday last they sold at 113¼. You have increased your circulation how much? About 5 per cent., or not more than 6. Here is an increase in the value of one single security about equal to that. Then your five-twenties, payable in May and November, sold for 111¼ on the 29th of November, and on the 14th of February they were 120, or 9 per cent. higher, while you have only increased your circulation by the amount of 6 per cent. While you have been increasing your circulation you have been diminishing its purchasing power, as I shall show before I get though with the few remarks I am making. You have actually made yourselves poorer, by the issue of these millions, in the purchasing power of the money you have put afloat. On the 29th day of November, January and July five-twenty bonds were 114⅛, and on the 14th day of February they were 120⅛, thus increasing in price to just about the extent of your increase of currency.

New York Central and Hudson River Railroad sold for 91¾ per cent. on the 29th of November, and on the 14th of February for 104⅝, or an increase of 13 per cent. Chicago and Rock Island sold for 93¾ on the 29th of November, and on Saturday last for 108½, or an advance of more than 15 per cent. Saint Paul, common, sold for 35 on the 29th of November, and on Saturday last at 47½, or a good deal more than 20 per cent. on the cost.

Mr. HOWE. What is the first date?

Mr. CHANDLER. November 29, 1873. I am trying now to show, if the Senate will give me their attention, that by the increase in Treasury notes we have diminished their purchasing value more than three times the amount of our increase. That is the point of my argument.

Mr. HOWE. I understood the point, but I did not understand what the first date was.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before, I read from the quotations of the 15th of September and the 14th of February, and now I am reading from those of the 29th of November, or the Saturday before Congress met, as compared with the prices of last Saturday; and I am showing, as I think I shall be able to show before I get through—though I fear I shall worry the Senate by going over these figures—that we have lost materially in purchasing value, and not only in this, but in other ways.

Mr. PRATT. If it does not interrupt my friend, I should like to ask him this question: how the quotations of the bonds and stocks he has referred to, on last Saturday, compare with their quotations just previous to the time the panic occurred, in September last?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is what I read before. There has been an increase of several per cent. I read the quotations of the 15th of September, and went over the whole list, showing an increase of every stock on the list. In other words, the panic is not only over and wholly gone, but there is speculation unprecedented going on to-day, preparatory to a worse crash than occurred after the 15th day of September. That is what I am trying to argue. That is the very point I am trying to make known here; this any man can see if he will give it his attention.

Now, Mr. President, I come to another class of figures, and I will ask the attention of the Senate while I show the effect upon the purchasing value of money by issuing your greenback circulation from the day it was first issued to the present time.

In 1862 we commenced the issue of greenbacks. In January, 1862, after our war had continued for a good many months, when my honorable friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] was in the ranks fighting gallantly for the country, the premium on gold was 2.5 per cent.; in February it was 3.5; in March, 1.8; in April, 1.5; in May, 1.3; in June, 6.5; in July, 15.5; in August, 14.5; in September, 18.5; in October, 28.5; in November, 31.1; in December, 32.3. It will be remembered that the then circulating medium (which was at that time State-bank notes) amounted to about $200,000,000. This circulation was increased during the year 1862 by the addition of $147,700,000 in greenbacks, andthat increase of circulation carried the value of gold from 102.5 on the 1st of January to 132.3 on the 31st day of December following. I account for that gradual increase in this way: The notes of the Government were issued at first, as my honorable friend from New Jersey will remember, in very small quantities, almost infinitesimal quantities; were paid out to the Army and produced no important effect; but by the end of the year 1862 the premium on gold had risento 32.3 per cent., or nearly one-third. The average premium during that calendar year was 13.3 per cent.

In 1863 the necessities of the Government compelled us to increase the greenback circulation to a yet larger extent. We issued during that year $263,500,000 additional, carrying up our greenback circulation to $411,200,000, in addition, of course, to our bank circulation, whatever it may have been. During the month of January of that year the premium on gold was 45.1 per cent.; during February, 60.5; March, 54.5; April, 51.5; May, 48.9; June, 44.5; July, 30.6; August, 25.8; September, 34.2; October, 47.7; November, 48; December, 51.1. In other words, the average rate of premium upon gold during that whole year was 45.2 per cent. I hold in my hand a paper showing the cash value of this emission for 1863. The emission of greenbacks at that time was $411,200,000. The average premium on gold was 45.2 per cent. The actual cash purchasing value of that four hundred and eleven millions, during the year 1863, was $283,195,000, and that was the whole purchasing value of that money during that year.

Then we come to the next year, 1864. In 1864 we increased our circulating medium by the addition of $237,900,000, making the whole amount of greenbacks then $649,100,000. I know that these figures are very dry and uninteresting, but I am trying to make them as brief as I can, and to make them as little annoying as possible. In 1864 we had carried our greenback circulation, as I have said, up to $649,100,000, or an increase of $237,900,000 since 1863. In 1864 the price of gold was, in January, 155.5; February, 158.6; March, 162.6; April, 172.7; May, 176.3; June, 210.7; July, 258.1; or less than forty cents on the dollar in coin for your greenbacks after you had carried the amount up to $649,000,000. In August the premium was 254.1; in September, 222.5; in October, 207.2; in November, 233.5; in December, 227.5. There is not a man here who does not remember, nor is there a farmer or mechanic throughout the length and breadth of the land who does not remember, that he then paid sixty cents for cotton goods that he had been in the habit of buying for twelve and a half cents, and that he paid for everything else in the same ratio. The merchant took care that he met with no loss; but the laboring man, the farmer, the man of muscle, was the man who submitted to this great loss, while the merchant and while every man with money took care of himself. During that year the average price of gold was 203.3 per cent., or your money was a fraction less than forty-eight and one-half cents on the dollar during the whole year. You had out that year $649,100,000, and the value of gold was 203.3, and the purchasing value of your $649,100,000 was $319,281,000, and that was the whole of it. The purchasing value of your $649,100,000 was more than fifty millions less than of the $400,000,000 you have out now, for it is four hundred millions including your fractional currency.

I am trying to convince the members of this body that inflation is not an increase of money. The people of the State of Michigan have become convinced of this by sad experience, at least those who have been there long enough to suffer from inflation; and I want to convince the members of this body that inflation is the greatest curse they can inflict upon the nation or upon their constitutents.

In 1865 you again increased the volume of your circulating medium by the amount of $49,800,000; making the whole amount of your circulation $698,900,000. During the month of January, 1865, the price of gold was 216.2; during February, 205.5; in March, 173.8; in April, 148.5; and after that it stood at 135.6, 140.1, 142.1, 143.5, 143.9, 145.5, 147, 146.2. The average of the year 1865 was 157.3; and what was the purchasing value of your greenbacks that year? Every man here will remark that that year we were disposing of our bonds at the rate of hundreds of millions of dollars a month; money was passing through the Treasury almost without limit. We had $1,000,000,000 that must be negotiated, and negotiated at once—seven-thirities and compound-interest notes and other floating liabilities that must be funded; and during that year the war had closed, and we were negotiating at this enormous rate, the price of gold fell to 153.3, and during that year the purchasing value of our circulation attained a higher rate than during any other year. That year, although our circulation of greenbacks was $698,900,000, and the premium on gold 57.3, the actual purchasing value of that $698,900,000 was $444,310,000.

In 1866 we retired $90,000,000, leaving $608,900,000, and the average premium on gold that year was 40.9 per cent. The purchasing value of the $608,900,000, with the premium on gold at 40.9, was $432,150,000.

The next year, 1867, we retired $72,300,000, and the premium on gold fell to 38.2. So we went on reducing until we got down to $400,000,000, and then we struck 14.9, 11.7, 12.4, and 14.7 as the premium on gold. There the matter has stood, and I have here from year to year the purchasing value for each year.

In 1867 the premium on gold was 38.2, and we had $536,600,000 of circulation, and the purchasing value of that was $388,277,000. In 1868 the premium was 39.9; we had $444,200,000 of circulation, and the purchasing value of it was $317,967,000. In 1869 the premium was 33 per cent.; we had $391,600,000 out; the purchasing value was $294,436,000. In 1870 the premium was 14.8; we had $398,400,000 out; the purchasing value was $346,736,000. In other words, you will perceive that the purchasing value of our $398,000,000 in 1870 was greater by $36,000,000 than the purchasing value of our $698,900,000 in 1865.

Mr. President, what we want is purchasing value, because the intrinsic value is measured by the purchasing value. There is not a bushel of wheat that goes from your State or from mine the purchasing value of which is not fixed by the gold value on the other side of the Atlantic. We are shipping millions and tens of millions and hundreds of millions of our agricultural products every year, and the value of these products is fixed in gold on the other side of the Atlantic; and yet by this increase of circulation we enhance the value of everything that the producer raises, but when the product comes to the market its value must be fixed by its price in gold across the Atlantic.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I see the impression that the Senator attempts to create is that the high price of gold was caused by issuing an excess of greenbacks during the years from 1862 to 1865. Is that the Senator's proposition?

Mr. CHANDLER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator to state whether or not he did not entertain the opinion about that time that it was the question as to whether we gained the victory or the other side that effected that?

Mr. CHANDLER. Most undoubtedly I voted for every issue, and should do it again. It was a question of life or death for the nation. But I am simply arguing to show that while, as a war measure, it was proper and suitable, as a peace measure it would be simply outrageous.

Mr. LOGAN. That is not the point, however. No matter how outrageous it is now, since the war is all over and the thing is done, you forced us who were risking our lives to take this money that you say now was worth only 20 per cent. on the dollar; you forced us to take it as a legal tender, making it equal to gold so far as the paying for service and debts was concerned at that time; and if I am not mistaken the record will show that the Senator before the country asseverated that to be the best financial measure that ever was instituted in this country.

But what I first asked was this: In the gold market in New York, did not the question as to whether we were defeated or not defeated in the field fix the value of gold after every battle that was fought during the war? I ask the Senator if gold did not universally go up when the Union troops were defeated, and universally go down when they were victorious, according to the estimates during the war?

Mr. CHANDLER. It undoubtedly had an influence, but it was not the primary and sole cause.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not talking about the primary cause.

Mr. CHANDLER. It had an influence, unquestionably.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask you to state if it is not a fact that every victory gained by the Union troops reduced the price of gold, and that every victory gained by the confederate troops enhanced the price of gold—I ask if that is not the historical fact?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have it here before me, and I can tell the Senator how much it affected the price of gold. I have the price of gold for every month from the commencement of the war to the end. If the Senator will name any special victory, I will tell him the exact influence it had.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not questioning that. I asked if that was not the fact.

Mr. CHANDLER. Undoubtedly it had some effect.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I ask this further question: If in 1863 we had $698,000,000 of currency in circulation, or $600,000,000—it makes no difference which; I prefer to use round numbers—during the time we had that amount in circulation and gold was standing at 140 or 150, no matter what, while no differences were being made in the Army, did not every victory against us during the time our currency stood at that amount increase the price of gold?

Mr. CHANDLER. Undoubtedly it did to some extent.

Mr. LOGAN. If it did, I ask then if we had not lost the victory would the price of gold have been changed?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not quite understand the Senator.

Mr. LOGAN. If we had $500,000,000 in circulation at a stated time, and gold was at a stated price, based upon that circulation, and a victory was gained by us which reduced the price of gold from that standard, or if lost by us, which increased the price of gold by that standard, was it the influence of the victory or the influence of the money?

Mr. CHANDLER. Both had some influence.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I hope you will not lay it all to the currency.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am trying to be as fair as I can on this whole question.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate to another set of figures that will be of great interest, I have no doubt, to some of our friends, because it alludes to a different state of facts. I hold in my hand a table of the value of what is called confederate money from time to time. The courts have decided that, where a suit is brought for a debt contracted in confederate money, the price of gold at the time the debt was contracted should be the price at which it should be calculated, on the gold basis.

From January to May, 1861, or while we were paying gold, the value of this money was 5 per cent. below par; from July to October it was 10 per cent.; from October 1 to 15 it was 12 per cent.; from October 15 to November 15, 15 per cent.; December 1, 20 per cent.; December 15, 30 per cent.; January 1, 1862, it stood at 20 per cent. below par; February 1, 25 per cent.; February 15, 40 per cent.; March 1, 50 per cent.; March 10, 65; April 1, 75; April 15, 80; May 15, 95; June 15, $2 for $1.

I am utterly surprised that our friends on the other side of the House, who have suffered so terribly from excessive inflation, should be in favor of inflation again. But I will go on with this.

July 1, it was $2 for $1; July 15, $2 for $1——

Mr. LOGAN. Is the Senator speaking of confederate money?

Mr. CHANDLER. Confederate money.

August 1 it was $2.30 for $1; September 1, $2.50 for $1; October 1, $2.50 for $1; February 1 to March 1, 1863, $3.10 for $1; March 1, $3.25 for $1; March 15 to May 15, $5 for $1; May 15, $6 for $1; June, $6.50 for $1; June 15, $7.50 for $1; July 1, $8 for $1; August 1, $14 for $1; September 1, $14 for $1; October 1, $15 for $1; November 1, $13 for $1; December 1, $20 for $1, or five cents on the dollar; December 15, $21 for $1; January 1, 1864, $21 for $1; January 15, $20 for $1; March 1, $26 for $1; April 1, $19 for $1; May 1, $20 for $1; June 1, $18 for $1; October 1, $27 for $1; October 15, $25 for $1, or four cents on the dollar; November 15, $8 for $1; December 1, $32 for $1; December 31, $51 for $1, or a fraction less than two cents on the dollar, growing less by degrees. On January 1, 1865, the value was $60 for $1; February 1, $50 for $1; March 1, $55 for $1; April 1, $70 for $1; April 20, $100 for $1, or one cent on a dollar; April 26, $200 for $1, or half a cent on a dollar; April 27, $300 for $1. This was while Grant was fighting, and it ran down pretty fast. April 26 it was $200 for $1: April 27, $300 for $1; April 28, $500 for $1, or five mills on the dollar; April 29, $800 for $1; April 30, $1,000 for $1, or one-tenth of one cent on the dollar. This is inflation carried out to its bitter end. May 1, 1865, it was $1,200 for $1, or eight-tenths of one-tenth of one cent on a dollar.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me right there to put a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly; as many as you please.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very much obliged to the Senator. I see the Senator is now comparing our national currency—United States currency—with the confederate currency.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, I am simply showing the effect of inflation.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to make my proposition.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I must say that I am very much surprised to see the war Senator, as he was termed not many years ago, so short a time having elapsed since the faith of this nation had been tried and the people tested it, to-day comparing our notes with confederate notes. Does he suppose that he can palm off any such sophistry as that upon an intelligent people? Does he not know that the confederate money was based upon a prospective government, and the moment the government was on the decline the money must decline—the very moment the government collapsed the money could not be worth the paper it was written on? Does he not know that; and does he stand here to-day in the presence of an intelligent community to compare the notes of a collapsed government and their depreciation with those of a competent, stable government like ours, whose notes have not been depreciated on account of want of faith in the Government? Great Heaven! if we have come to this kind of argumentation on the side of the bullionists, or the side of the contractionists, on the side of the rich against the muscle and energy of the country, that they must compare our Government, standing as it does to-day the pride of the world, against the notes of a confederate collapsed government, I am ashamed of my country if such stuff as this should be received by even a man that was depreciated in intellect.

Now, another question——

Mr. CHANDLER. Had I not better answer them one at a time?

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I will ask one at a time, because I must say——

Mr. CHANDLER. O, go right through; ask them all. I would as soon take one raking shot as a pop at a time.

Mr. LOGAN. I know the Senator is competent to take a thousand and ward them all off. I am only saying that I am astonished at a comparison of that kind. I must say so, and I will put my way of argument on his particular line. He was arguing to the Senate that the currency of this Government depreciated according to the amount that was issued. That was his argument. He did admit, however, that victories or defeats had something to do with the increase or decrease in the value of gold.

Does the Senator not know, and I put the question, that if the confederacy had been sustained and become a fixed and stable government, their money then would have been of value according to their ability to redeem and pay it? But inasmuch as the government de facto declined and finally was destroyed and entirely collapsed, and was without any basis, structure, or form in existence, the money, of course, of necessity, must also collapse. I ask him if he will state that the comparison he makes is a genuine and fair one to make before the Senate?

Mr. CHANDLER. I was endeavoring to show that the issue had very much to do with the value of coin, and I show it from these figures, that after we had diminished our issue of greenbacks to a certain limit, the value of coin fell from 33 in a single year to 14, and that it had remained, as I read, in 1870, $14\frac{9}{10}$; in 1871, $14\frac{7}{10}$—I am giving you the average throughout the year—in 1872, $12\frac{4}{10}$; in 1873, $14\frac{7}{10}$, thus remaining substantially at the same figure, rising a little now and falling a little then, but remaining substantially at the same figure so long as you held the quantity of greenbacks at that amount; and prior to that I had shown that as you increased the issue of your greenbacks enormously, you increased the value of your gold, and that after you had reduced it to a certain amount, you reduced the value of your gold.

Now, sir, with regard to comparing these figures, I took them as an exhibition of the effect of excessive issues. But suppose you take your continental money which has never been redeemed, issued to meet the demand for more money; and so they kept on, issuing more money, more money—take the continental money that first won us our independence as a nation, and what to-day is the value of that money?

Now, Mr. President, a great deal has been said about the issue of greenbacks in place of national currency. I should like to ask any man who makes that proposition how he proposes to get the greenbacks out of the Treasury of the United States into the hands of the people. The business of a bank is to discount bills of exchange, to discount notes. A man in Chicago buys a cargo of wheat, corn, or oats, and draws a bill of exchange on the city of New York, or his factor in Buffalo, or wherever he ships his cargo. He goes into the bank and takes his currency for that exchange. That is the business of a bank. Now, suppose you abolish all banks, do you propose to have your Government, your national Treasury, issue bills of exchange, issue the greenbacks, and get them into the hands of the people? Is that what you propose?

Mr. CAMERON. That is not my proposition.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator does not propose that. I am in favor of the Senator's proposition, with an amendment.

Now, there are only two ways to get the greenbacks into the hands of the people. You can go and buy bonds, but I have shown you that your bonds are to-day worth over 120 cents on the dollar. If you resolve to-day to issue $100,000,000 in greenbacks for the purpose of purchasing your bonds, you carry those bonds up to 130 or 140 perhaps; nobody knows where you will carry your gold-bearing bonds. I ask any man to answer me that question. Suppose you issue $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 or $500,000,000 of greenbacks, how are you going to get one solitary dollar into the hands of the people unless you go into the market and buy your bonds; and then they do not relieve the people to the amount of a solitary dollar? You must turn your Government into a broker's shop and discount the bills of A, B, and C, all over the country. How much would you give for your assets after you have carried on that business for twelve months?

Mr. President, I know of no way to substitute the Treasury of the United States for the banking experience of the last ten centuries. We have the experience of the past, we have the experience of our own nation, we have the experience of the world. Now, do we propose to throw aside this experience, and to launch our boat upon a wild and uncertain sea, an ocean of expansion and no payments, an ocean of expansion, for what?

Sir, there are very few persons within the range of my acquaintance who desire expansion of an irredeemable currency. Certainly the people of Michigan have had abundance of experience of that kind. But wherever you go you will find two classes of men who are making a great noise about "more money." One is the speculator, the impecunious speculator, who has, perhaps, bought real estate and given a mortgage, and thinks that his only chance is to reduce the value of your currency until it falls so low that the people would rather take his land than hold your money; and the other is the man who has issued his paper without intending to pay when it matures, and who can borrow no more money upon any terms until he pays what he already owes.

Mr. MORTON obtained the floor.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to one thing?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] to an amendment which I had intended to offer to meet the very purpose suggested by him. It differs from his proposed amendment only in two particulars. As I have drawn mine, it points out the way in which the Secretary is to get possession of the greenbacks to retire, and instead of retiring dollar for dollar, I propose to retire eighty-five cents on the dollar, leaving fifteen cents to meet the reserve.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will accept that as an amendment, or I will withdraw mine and allow that to be substituted. I have no particular preference for mine.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOREMAN in the chair.) The proposed amendment will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall once in each month sell to the highest bidder for United States notes coupon bonds equal to 85 per cent. of the additional bank circulation issued during the month preceding, which bonds shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually; and the principal shall be payable at the pleasure of the Government after ten years from their date, both principal and interest to be paid in gold coin; but none of said bonds shall be sold at less than their par value, and the United States notes received in exchange therefor shall never be reissued, but shall be destroyed.

Mr. HOWE. It is suggested by Senators that the interest should be payable quarterly, instead of semi-annually.

Mr. SHERMAN. By the law, the interest is payable certainly semi-annually; but I think the Secretary has the right to issue bonds with the interest payable quarterly—the new 5 per cents.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I think the argument on the other side may be said to be on its last legs when it is found necessary to compare our currency with the confederate currency. The answer was made by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] that the value of the confederate money declined with the fortunes and prospects of the southern confederacy, and that when the confederacy was entirely gone its money had no value whatever.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] referred to the wild-cat banks of Michigan when he said the people wanted more money. I suppose they did want more money; but they wanted money that would answer their purposes. They started a system of banks. Those banks were on a specie basis. They were precisely after the desire and the heart of my friend from Michigan. They were to be specie-paying banks.

Mr. CHANDLER. So the wild-cat banks of Michigan were the same.

Mr. MORTON. I am speaking now of those very banks. I presume the Senator was in favor of them. They were to be specie-paying banks—none of your national banks, issuing notes to be redeemed in greenbacks, but the notes were to be redeemed in specie; and they furnished kegs of nails with the specie on top as the basis. Those banks were started without capital; they were not secured by United States stocks; they were a swindle; they failed to redeem the notes in specie, or in anything else; and that has been the history of nearly all the banks in this country that were started as specie-paying banks. I can appeal to my friend from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] that nearly all the State banks, with a few honorable exceptions, that started as specie-paying banks and were required to pay their notes in specie, when the time came, failed to pay specie. The most of the specie-paying banks suspended when they were called upon to pay specie, and the relief afforded to the country in every time of panic was by their suspension. I heard my friend speak of it, and I had occasion myself to refer to it some time ago. When the great panic of 1857 came on, the country was relieved, not by the payment of their notes in specie, but by their suspension.

Now, Mr. President, what comparison is there between the wild-cat banks of Michigan and the national banks of this country? I ask the Senator how national-bank notes, secured by United States stocks, that he says command a premium of 20 per cent. in the market, that command a premium in gold now in Europe, can be insecure upon his own argument? If his argument is worth anything, it proves the soundness of this system, and the unsoundness of the one that he would seem to hold up for our admiration.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is the security any better now than it was when our notes were selling for thirty cents on the dollar? It is the same bond that is held as security.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir, the security is better in the markets of the world. The bonds were then depreciated. Let him remember that until after the war was over the bonds never got above the value of the greenbacks. The bonds were purchased with greenbacks, and the bonds and the greenbacks came along side by side as long as we had bonds to sell in greenbacks. The Senator forgets that important fact, that as long as we had bonds to sell in greenbacks the bonds never got above the value of the greenbacks. When we no longer had bonds to sell in greenbacks, then the bonds acquired a value above the greenbacks in the markets of the world, and got to be par in gold and even to command a premium in gold. Why, Mr. President, the national-bank notes until the end of the war were of the same value as the bonds precisely. Why? Because they were redeemable in greenbacks, and the greenbacks had the same value as the bonds. It was only after you took away the power to buy bonds with greenbacks that the bonds acquired a superior value. Does the Senator forget that fact? He certainly does.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion in connection with his argument, by way of additional reason?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. The depreciation of the bonds during the war depended much upon the confidence of the people in the ability of our Government to suppress the rebellion and become a permanent government again, and until after the war there was no such thing as a par value of bonds.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to remind him that it was not until June 23, 1870, I think, that our five-twenty 6 per cent. bonds came to par in gold.

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir. When gold was at 250 premium, that was just the premium of gold over the bonds precisely. Why? Because greenbacks were then purchasing bonds at par of the Government. Now, Mr. President, the bonds have a gold value all over the world. Our 6 per cents command a premium in gold in Europe, and our bank-notes are secured by these gold-bearing and gold-par bonds. I ask how such notes can be insecure? I ask how such a system of banking can be an unsound one?

But, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to another part of the argument of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER,] for in some respects it was an extraordinary argument. The Senator, for the purpose of showing that the panic had passed by, and that we had enough money, and did not want any more, referred to the prices of stocks in New York, and referred to the rate of discount now prevailing in New York. That was a pretty good argument as far as it went. It did not prove all that he intended to prove by it, by a good deal. But now mark the next step in his argument. For the purpose of overcoming the argument made upon this floor some time ago, that the increase of the circulation by the addition of $27,000,000 greenbacks had had a great deal to do with the restoration of good times, he takes the same fact of the increase of prices to show the evils of inflation, and he shows that the money has lost its purchasing power by referring to the same increase of prices. First, the argument does good service to show that good times have returned, and that we have got plenty of money, and do not need any more, and then it comes in to show that there is inflation, and that there has been a depreciation of the purchasing power of money by the addition of $27,000,000 greenbacks to the circulation! If that argument is good in one place, is it not good in the other? The Senator cannot make it do duty on both sides of that question, certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I did not introduce that as the cause for the good times, but I did bring it in to meet the other point. I hope the Senator will give me credit for no more than I said.

Mr. MORTON. I did not intend to misrepresent the Senator; but if I understood him at all, he first referred to the quotations of exchange and of good mercantile paper and the price of stocks in New York, to show that good times had returned and that money was plenty and the panic was over and past, and then he resorted to the same argument a few minutes afterward to show that by the addition of $27,000,000 of greenbacks, the purchasing power of money had been impaired. How prove it was impaired? By the same increase of prices!

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] who I see is in his seat, to an argument which I understood him to make last night, and which I believe is recorded in the reports this morning, that the objection to taking $25,000,000 of circulation from New England, and part of it from Rhode Island, was not because it would make any difference to Rhode Island's business whether the banks were located there or located in the West, but simply because it was not right; that they had been compelled, in the first place, to take that banking capital, and that now to take it from them would be wrong; but that so far as the business of Rhode Island was concerned it did not make any difference whether those banks were located in Rhode Island or located in Indiana. That was my friend's argument. Now I have a paper here, signed by the officers of thirty-two national banks in Rhode Island, dated the 5th of February instant, and I will ask to have this paper read, for the purpose of showing the view that New England bankers take in regard to this circulation, and to show whether it is important to the business of New England to have these banks located in their midst or located somewhere else; and I ask the attention of the Senate to the document, for it is a very able one.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, citizens of the State of Rhode Island, representing the various national banking institutions of the State, respectfully represent:

That the provisions of the sixth section of the act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes, approved July 12, 1870, directing in effect the withdrawal from the banking associations which were the first to organize under the act to provide a national banking currency, &c., of their circulating notes to the amount of $25,000,000, will operate, if enforced by any legislation providing for machinery to give effect to the section of the law referred to, very prejudicially to the interests of this State and of New England.

The national banking capital in the State amounts to $20,500,000, and the amount of bonds pledged for circulation is about $15,000,000.

All of the national banking associations organized promptly after the passage of the act, and at the time when it was of vital importance to the preservation of the Government that the financial system by the act inaugurated should be accepted by the country.

The very large and varied manufacturing and mechanical industries in this State, the extent of which will be best appreciated from the fact that the first collection district paid a larger internal-revenue tax on manufactures for several years into the Treasury than any other in the country, require for their successful prosecution all the banking facilities which the State now has. To contract any part of the circulation would directly diminish the volume of money resources, enhance the value of currency necessarily required for the weekly payment of thousands of operatives, and create financial disturbance, all resulting in the end in an increase of burden upon the consumer.

The undersigned believe that the attempt to equalize the distribution of currency by withdrawals from the earlier-organized banking associations of a percentage of their circulation, to be given to associations in States and Territories having less than their proportion, would be attended with greater loss to the industrial communities which would suffer thereby than could possibly result from equalizing the proportions of circulation by increasing the volume of currency to the extent of twenty-five millions for the benefit of associations in the States and Territories having less than their proportion.

The undersigned therefore pray that the sixth section of the act above referred to be repealed; and they respectfully protest against the passage of the bill just reported from the Finance Committee, to provide for carrying into effect the sixth section of said act.

PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND, February 5, 1874.

Mr. MORTON. Now I call the attention of the Senate to the statement made by these distinguished bankers and financiers, that it is better to equalize the circulation by the issue of additional currency to the amount of $25,000,000 than to take $25,000,000 from the currency of New England. Those men are presumed to understand the subject pretty well, and they think that would be the lesser of the two evils; and they say in direct terms, in contravention of the argument that has been made on this floor, that to take this currency from New England does derange their business, and will produce financial disasters. It did not require their statement to make me understand that, as I thought; but we have been told here that it does not make any difference; you can transfer $25,000,000 from the East to the West; it does not make a bit of difference where these banks are. They say it does. They say it will contract their currency; it will diminish their means of paying their operatives, and will most seriously and unfavorably affect their business. They are right about it, and those Senators who make the other argument are wrong.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator appeals to me. Does he wish me to answer?

Mr. MORTON. I did not appeal to my friend; but if he desires to say anything I will give way.

Mr. ANTHONY. I noticed in that memorial the passage to which the Senator from Indiana calls my attention; and as it did not need this indorsement of his views to convince him of their soundness, so even the passage to which he refers does not convince me of the soundness of the Senator's theory. Undoubtedly there are persons in our community who hold to the views which the Senator from Indiana so ably expresses, men whose judgment is entitled to high consideration. But although I should be very sorry to see this currency withdrawn from the banks to which it was assigned and which took it in good faith, I would think it a lesser evil to carry out the law which takes the money from them than to enter upon a plan of the indefinite dilution of the currency.

Mr. President, we are not sent here to prevent an injury threatened to our own constituents by inflicting a greater injury upon the whole country. We are Senators of the United States. We are to look to the currency of the whole country. But taking the narrowest view, taking its effect only upon those whom I have the honor in part to represent, I believe it would injure them more to have the currency inflated than it would to have the surplus circulation taken from them. If it took away the bank capital with the circulation it would undoubtedly take away much of our facilities for business; but the capital will remain where it is. It will be loaned, as it is loaned now, for our industry and for our production, and the circulation will come back to us if we need it, and we cannot keep it there if we do not need it.

I am sorry to differ in any degree from gentlemen whose views are entitled to so great respect, some of whom, I am confident, signed the paper, concurring in the general object of it, but not in all the reasons assigned for it. But my opinion, as I stated it in the beginning, has grown stronger throughout this discussion.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to one thing further which would result from the passage of a bill to take $25,000,000 only from the banks in these three or four States, and I am indebted to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] for the thought, and it is unquestionably correct. The very day a bill is signed to take $25,000,000 from one section of the country and give it to another, that is equivalent to a contraction of the currency to the amount of $25,000,000; and why? Because the banks from which it is to be taken, understanding that they may be called upon to return that currency at any day, are not at liberty to lend it. They must contract their loans and discounts at once to that amount. There must be contraction to that extent, with all its disasters and attending evils.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will allow me, that is an argument against his scheme, but it is not an argument against what I have said. It is an argument against taking away the $25,000,000, and there I agree with him. It is not an argument for inflation; there we do not agree.

Mr. MORTON. I was giving it as an argument to show why the passage of this bill would do harm. The Senator says it will not do any harm. He entered into an argument a few minutes ago to answer his own constituents, the representatives of thirty-two banks, to show that they were wrong in their convictions. They give reasons why taking from them this $25,000,000 would hurt them. The Senator thinks their reasons are not good. I give another one; that is, that it would produce contraction at once to the amount of $25,000,000, and that would certainly affect the whole country.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana that while it might produce a good deal of embarrassment to take the $25,000,000 or the $50,000,000 from the East, there is a plan which I think the committee might evolve which would accomplish all that is desired without producing any embarrassments. Suppose the amount of bank circulation was increased $25,000,000 or $50,000,000, and at the same time the United States notes were diminished just that amount, what would be the result? We have no increase of paper money; we take nothing from the East to give to the West; we give the West the banking facilities that they desire. That proposition it seems to me meets the whole question. If it does not, I should like to be corrected.

And further, Mr. President, unless my friend from Indiana desires to resume the floor——

Mr. MORTON. I give way to my friend from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that any increase of bank circulation, which ought only to be made, according to my view, with a corresponding decrease of United States notes, ought not to be based upon existing bonds, but ought to be confined to a new issue of bonds, so that the United States may reap the benefit of the increased value of the bonds by reason of this franchise being attached to them.

Further, the distribution of this new bank circulation should be confined to States that have not their distributive share. And if my friend from Indiana will pardon me one word more, there ought to be another condition. There ought to be in the law provision made for assorting-houses so that the bills of the different banks may at stated times be returned to them. The benefit of that is that it compels the banks to keep their affairs in a healthful condition in order that they may redeem, which is a great benefit to the depositors. It localizes circulation, the very thing which is sought, while it does not destroy the national character of the notes.

I think that there ought also to be a provision that no one should have the benefit of creating a banking association unless he produces the license of the Legislature of the State or of the governor of the State to that end. This would secure the proper location of the banks and greater integrity and respectability in the character of the persons to whom we commit this valuable franchise.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to see this subject, without any division of sentiment, just referred back to the committee. I think we ought to take that course. There are some of us that want it done. I think that the usual regard which is paid in the Senate for the opinions of each other calls upon those who think that there is no advantage in doing so to accede to that proposition. I think that the Committee on Finance have derived, as I certainly have, great instruction, great benefit, from the debate which has progressed here for the last fortnight. I think that the very first section of a bill containing the provisions which I have thus roughly indicated should be a provision which we all would agree in, that the Treasurer be authorized to accumulate gold with a view to specie payments. That would produce no contraction, but if successful would increase the volume of currency. I notice that the chairman of the Committee on Finance says it cannot be done. I believe it can be done; and to offset the opinion of the chairman, I would say that the Secretary of the Treasury agrees with me that it can be done, and that that is the way in which we are to fulfill the pledge we have given.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I am not wanting in respect for the opinions of the Committee on Finance; I respect the gentlemen of that committee as highly as any person on this floor; but I think we know pretty well what their opinions are. On the same day that the bill which we are now considering was reported, the chairman of the Committee on Finance introduced a bill himself, which is on my desk, providing for converting the greenbacks into a 5 per cent. bond to commence on the 1st of January, 1875; the greenbacks to be paid out again, either for ordinary expenses or in the purchase of 6 per cent. bonds.

But I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the fact that he is not willing apparently that increased banking facilities shall be extended to the States South and West upon like conditions with those now enjoyed by other States. He wants the new banks to be required to bank upon a different bond. He wants them to be required to have the consent of their State Legislature as to the character of the bank, the amount of capital, and the place of location. These are all new obstacles thrown in the way of the establishment of new banks.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend misunderstands me if he thinks that I am not in favor of affording these facilities to the South and West; and the suggestions I made were not made by way of producing obstacles. If those who are interested in the creation of these new associations do not see the propriety or the benefit of them, I would vote for a bill waiving those provisions. I only suggested them as what occurred to me would be good provisions for any part of the country.

Mr. MORTON. I did not attribute to my friend the motive of desiring—but that is certainly the effect of his suggestion—that the new banks shall not stand upon equal terms with the old banks, but must bank upon less profitable bonds, and that they must submit to conditions that were not imposed upon the old banks.

Now, Mr. President, one word in regard to the amendment of my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] which the Senator from Michigan has accepted as a substitute. It is not before the Senate, but still I will speak of it for a moment. It is that as fast as the new bank currency is issued, 85 per cent. of greenbacks shall be retired and destroyed; that to procure these greenbacks the Government shall issue a 5 per cent. bond; that a non-interest-bearing debt shall be converted into an interest-bearing debt. I think that is the smallest argument there is against the proposition, so far as the interest is concerned. I simply have this to say in reply to that suggestion: If the volume of currency is to be confined absolutely to the present limit, if the people of the West and South can only get increased banking facilities on that basis, then they would consent, perhaps, to the retirement of a part of the greenbacks in order to obtain those increased banking facilities; but so far as I understand the people, it is not their desire or their wish to diminish the volume of the greenbacks. They furnish a popular currency in which everybody has confidence, and a large part of the people would rather increase the volume of the greenbacks than diminish the volume. Now, I suggest to my friend, let one proposition stand for itself. First, let us legislate in some way to give the people of the West and South the increased banking facilities they want; and after that has been fixed, then let us come to the consideration of these other questions.

I intended to say one word about the quotations of stock prices made by the Senator from Michigan, but it is hardly necessary. The idea of quoting fancy stocks in the market in New York, or even dividend-paying stocks, as an index of the condition of the country is somewhat new when we know that the best stocks in that market, dividend-paying stocks, the New York Central if you please, go up and down under the manipulations of the bulls and the bears, while, so far as fancy stocks are concerned, their price does not depend upon the intrinsic value of the stock or, in fact, upon the ordinary conditions that affect the money market. But the Senator from Michigan has brought forward these stock quotations as an evidence that the panic is all over and gone, that no more money is needed, and that we should let things be just as they are and retire the greenbacks!

Mr. SCHURZ. May I ask the Senator from Indiana a question?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHURZ. Does the Senator mean to assert that there has not been a general improvement, a greater ease of business, all over the country?

Mr. MORTON. I do not mean to assert that, and I have not asserted it.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then I should think the argument of the Senator from Michigan would not be so bad, after all.

Mr. MORTON. I do not mean to assert that the effects of the panic have not all passed by, and I think the Senator himself will not assert to the contrary. There has been some improvement; there has been recuperation to some extent all over the country; and the issue of $27,000,000 of greenbacks in addition to the volume existing last September has had very much to do with it; we all know that. From the very time that money began to come forth there was relief experienced to some extent; and much of it is to be attributed to the increase in the volume of the currency.

Mr. SCHURZ. Would the Senator say, from his own point of view, that a further increase of the currency, generally, would be necessary for the business of the country now?

Mr. MORTON. I have argued the question of the importance, in my opinion, of an increase of the currency. The Senator has heard it from time to time, and it is not necessary for me to go over it again.

The point I was speaking of at the time the Senator from Missouri appealed to me was that while there has been an improvement in the times—it would be a very sad thing if there had not been—still that improvement is not complete. The Senator from Michigan may quote the prices of stocks in the New York market; but we know very well that the effects of the panic will be found in every county in the United States this day.

Mr. SCHURZ. With the permission of the Senator from Indiana, I desire to ask, if it is shown that in the country money is easy, that there is no difficulty in procuring loans at the present moment, would not that show, at the same time, that an increase of the currency would not be necessary now for the purpose of producing that result? And for that reason I put to the Senator the question whether he thinks that, at the present moment, the requirements of business still are such as to make an increase of the currency necessary from his point of view?

Mr. MORTON. If it was shown that money was easy everywhere, that might be; but that is a thing that cannot be shown.

Mr. SCHURZ. Is the Senator through?

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator wants to go on I am through.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then I wish to make a short statement in regard to the condition of the money market, not in New York, but in other parts of the country, a statement based upon the very best kind of authority. I am quoting now from the money article of a Chicago paper:

WEDNESDAY EVENING, February 4.

The progress toward greater ease in the money markets all over the country continues. We have reason to believe that, in default of employment in the East, a large amount of eastern and Canadian bank capital is now coming to this market for loan on warehouse receipts for grain and provisions. As remarked yesterday, the country west of this city is also full of money. In many parts of the country there is more money offered for loan on mortgages than can be used, and the same is getting to be the case in this city. This plethora of money is partly due to the depression of some branches of business, particularly of manufacturing. But a considerable portion of the manufacturing industry of a year or two ago was of a temporary kind, dependent on the continued extension of railroads for its support. This part of manufacturing will not revive, because the era of excessive railroad extension is over, but all that part of manufacturing which creates articles of consumption by the people of the West must revive before long, because the agricultural districts have sold large crops and are rich.

SATURDAY EVENING, February 7.

The increase in the supply of money in this market since the beginning of the week has been quite decided. The banks are carrying a very large amount of grain and provisions, and, therefore, the easier condition of the market is not so marked with them as in the open market. There is, however, a larger supply of loanable funds in the country west of this city than for several years before.

TUESDAY EVENING, February 10.

The shipments of currency to the wheat-raising sections of the Northwest continue liberal, but the amounts coming in from other parts of the country West and Southwest are about equal to the outward movement.

There seems to be an increase in the supply of money in the markets throughout the country from day to day, and even the most inveterate inflationist must acknowledge that the present condition of the money market is a strong argument against the theory of a deficiency in the volume of currency.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, February 11.

We find it necessary to repeat the same story from day to day now, namely, that the supply of loanable funds in the local market is increasing. The country shippers are sending us an enormous quantity of grain, but the country banks are also sending a great deal of money to their correspondents in this city, with instructions to lend it at 10 per cent. or less, and thus while the demand for money to carry grain increases, the money which the country has received for the large crops already sold is being applied to keep up prices. The situation is an unusual one, and amounts in fact to a sort of a combination on the part of western capital to sustain the prices of western products. If it were not for the heavy receipts of grain in this city at present, there is little doubt that prices could not only be sustained but would advance. But if the country shippers keep sending it in at the present rate, they will force a general decline, and so establish a lower range of prices for what they have on hand yet to sell. The foreign markets seem to be in a condition to take a large amount at good prices if they are not glutted by too heavy shipments.

THURSDAY EVENING, February 12.

Notwithstanding the large amount of money absorbed in carrying grain and provisions in this market—

You see speculation has already revived there—the supply of loanable funds in the market is greater than finds employment. It is freely offered on demand loans at 8 per cent., and on time loans at 10; but there seems scarcely any inducement to put the rates of money lower than these figures. In this market when a borrower wants money at all he wants it bad enough to pay 10 or 8 per cent. for it, and the difference of 1, or even 2 per cent. on short-time loans would not be sufficient to induce him to embark in any enterprise which he otherwise would not. In the eastern markets it is different. Speculators deal to a large extent in dividend-paying stocks, which fluctuate less in price than western products, and when the rate of interest on money gets below the average rate of dividends on certain stocks it is borrowed to carry the stocks or speculate in them. In this market, however, the supply of money—be it ever so abundant—seldom puts the rate of money below 8 per cent. on demand and 10 per cent. on sixty or ninety days. What is not used at these rates either lies idle or is sent East, where the New York banks pay 4 per cent. on current balances.

FRIDAY EVENING, February 13.

It is acknowledged on all sides that money was never more abundant in the West than it is just at the present time. The country west of here is full of money, particularly the sections that have marketed such a large crop of hogs and such large quantities of corn in the last three months. Country banks find it impossible to use their money at home, and have been sending it into this city for some weeks past in large amounts to loan on collaterals at 10 per cent. But the demand is insufficient to the supply of money.

Mark you, the demand is insufficient to the supply of money.

Borrowers see that they can get the money at 8 per cent. on thirty-day loans just as well as to pay 10, and are making a stand for a reduction in the rates. We hear of some thirty and sixty day loans at 9 per cent., and doubtless some are made at 8 per cent. in the open market, though lenders refuse to acknowledge the reduction. This accumulation of money in the West seems to be partly due to the fact that there is less speculation in railway stocks and less borrowing on new railroad bonds in New York City than there used to be before the panic.

Of course it is.

The collapse of speculative schemes last fall diverted money from those channels of investment and directed it into speculation in western products.

SATURDAY EVENING, February 14.

The gradual accumulation of money, which has been the most notable feature of the local market for the last month, continues. The banks, however, have been obliged to hold back from loaning so freely on pork and grain, except with large margins, because the speculation in almost everything is piling up a load that threatens to break down prices.

There you see the effect of the accumulation of money, and a superfluous accumulation of money at that, in the western markets.

There is, however, plenty of money to loan on satisfactory collateral at 10, and 9 per cent. in some cases, for thirty or sixty days, and at 8 per cent. on demand.

I could go on for an hour reading similar reports from Cincinnati, Saint Louis, and other western cities, and still the Senator asserts that there is not money enough to float the business of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to read, without interrupting the Senator from Missouri, from the Cincinnati Gazette of yesterday on this point in regard to the abundance of money. It has just been laid on my table, and I will read it:

There has been a good demand for discounts in our local market, but the banks have gained in means and have met it freely at 8 to 9 per cent., and although there has been considerable currency sent to the country in nearly all directions, the general supply appears to be larger than a week ago. Yesterday there was a fair demand for money, and rates were unchanged. In the open market money is very plenty, and prime business paper is readily placed at 9 to 10 per cent., and chiefly at the inside figure.

That is yesterday's Cincinnati Gazette.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Inasmuch as the Senator from Missouri has spoken of the business interests and an alleged plethora of money, I want to call his attention to a concern in his State, the glass works at Crystal City, with a capital of $250,000, and with no outstanding notes, and were last month unable to negotiate a note of $5,000 upon the ordinary rate of 10 per cent.; that is in his own State. Then I might show him other business interests in Chicago and Milwaukee of like character. I think the Senator is not thrown so much in the channels of business as perhaps strictly business men; and I can tell him from my own experience and knowledge, coming through business channels, that even in the city of Chicago, take any branch of business, take the lumbering interest for instance, in which, by the way, I am interested, and know something more about it perhaps than the Senator himself, and I can state to him that men of undoubted credit before and since the panic cannot obtain accommodations at bank. Men, too, who have had lines of discount from $10,000 to $25,000, and even $30,000, find themselves unable to get discounts of even $5,000, and in consequence have had to suspend their business.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator says that men of undoubted credit before the panic are not able to negotiate their notes now. They may have been men of undoubted credit before the panic, but may not be men of undoubted credit after the panic.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I would not state a fact of that kind as illustrative of the point I am attempting to make. The Senator from Missouri is too astute to suppose that I meant a case of a man who had credit before the panic, and had no credit afterward. That would be a comparison that would hardly be admissible before an American Senate. I am talking about men who stood after the panic as they did before, owing no more and no less; men who are accustomed to business transactions, and who have commercial credit.

Take the line of commission-men in the city of Chicago, and doing business in the purchase and sale of lumber; men who were favored with large lines of discounts, and now cannot negotiate like paper, which they easily did before the panic; and men owing no more now than they did then. I put that to the Senator as illustrating the very reverse of what he has been quoting and commenting upon, and directly affecting a branch of the business interests of the land. There is more significance in the fact than in these call-loan rates in New York. I can tell the Senator that the gilt-edged paper which has been spoken of here, even in Wall street, cannot be negotiated short of 10 to 15 per cent., unless bolstered by collaterals of the best kind. The low rates apply only to money upon call, supported by undoubted collaterals equivalent to United States bonds.

Now while I am up let me speak of another fact. Take the Northwest Railway Company, as well known as that company is, and the business it is doing. That company issued a note, indorsed by the Milwaukee Rolling-Mill Company, a large iron concern—and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] before me, knows something of that, or if not, his colleague, now in the chair, does, residing as he does in the city of Milwaukee. That railway company's note for $22,000, indorsed by this rolling-mill company, with a paid-up capital of a million and a half, could not be negotiated last month in New York, Boston, or New Bedford, short of 11 to 12 per cent. I put that to the Senator as a fact coming to me from a party interested; and I say that the representations of papers that are gotten up in some measure in the interest of the opposition which we have to combat here, are hardly a fair exhibit of the real condition of business interests and their relations to the money centers of the country.

Now, let me cite another instance. I know of a bank of excellent credit in Michigan, doing business in New York, having ordinarily a line of $50,000, and yet unable to get a discount at that bank where its business is done; and yet the Senator thinks that money is plenty, and that anybody can get it on proper security.

Let me state another case. A bank in my own city, that passed through the panic unscathed while banks around it suspended, and holding a line of discounts before the panic of $50,000, to my own personal knowledge could not get a $10,000 loan in the city of New York. If a national bank whose integrity was tested by the panic cannot obtain moderate accommodation in the city of New York, can it justly be said that the plethora of money is what the Senator has stated, or that the supply is meeting the expectation of the country or relieving it in this emergency?

Mr. SCHURZ. Now it seems to me that the gentlemen who advocate expansion—I had almost said "inflation," but that term is offensive to the Senator from Michigan—must be exceedingly hard pressed for arguments, when in reply to the market reports of papers that are recognized as good mercantile authority they have nothing to show but letters from private persons who cannot get all the money they want. Of course there are a great many firms in this country that find it difficult to raise all the loans and discounts which they desire. There always have been; there always will be. But shall we, when a business man writes to one of us saying, "I cannot get money at a convenient rate of interest for my purposes," at once jump right into the breach and just issue so and so many millions more of irredeemable currency? Why, gentlemen, what absurdity! Of course, there are a great many people in the country who have not got as much money as they want. But here we have a general report upon the state of business in the country, and when I lay that as good authority—for such it is—before the Senate, Senators are at once on their feet and say, "I have got a letter from this man and from that man." Is that argument?

Let me read to the Senator a little more from a market article of the Chicago Tribune, which will shed some light upon some particular branches of business. It is taken from the weekly report of February 13; I have saved it because it is quite interesting:

While it is not probable that the farmers of the West understood this well enough—

That is to say, that the collapse of speculative schemes last fall diverted money from those channels of investment and directed it to speculation in western products.

While it is not probable that the farmers of the West understood this well enough to think that prices of western products were being sustained by speculation that must sooner or later come to an end and allow prices to recede, they have at least, for once in many years, been sensible enough to sell their pork, and corn, and wheat freely, while they would bring good prices. This is doubtless yet the feeling of the wheat-growers and shippers of Northern Iowa and Southern Minnesota, who are sending their wheat to market in such large quantities now.

For nearly a month past there has been a moderate but constant movement of currency from Southern and Central Illinois, Indiana, and Michigan to this city, and from here to Northern Iowa, Southern Minnesota, and Northern Wisconsin. Some of the banks here estimate that not less than $3,000,000 of currency have been sent to half a dozen towns like McGregor, Lansing, and Winona, in the great wheat-raising district northwest of here, in the last four weeks. Scarcely any currency has come back from that direction yet, from which it may be inferred that it is in active circulation in that quarter, as it was in the corn and pork raising districts six or eight weeks ago, and that the heavy receipts of wheat will continue. In this view it seems scarcely possible that prices of wheat can be sustained even at their present figures. But, aside from this aspect of the case, the mildness of the winter all over the world has had an effect on the foreign markets, by permitting exports of wheat from Odessa during months when it has seldom been practicable in former years.

Now, I desire the Senator from Michigan to give me his attention a moment.

Notwithstanding the abundance of money in this city, and throughout the West, it is frequently remarked that "trade is dull." This is true of some lines of business. The wholesale dry-goods trade is dull, but it always is so at this season of the year. Some branches of manufacturing are much depressed, and the retail trade of the city is also dull; partly because manufacturing is depressed, and partly because there are too many people in the business; in fact, the tendency of the last ten years has been to an excessive competition in the business of buying and selling goods. Too many people have been trying to live by exchanging commodities instead of producing something; and it is the desire to galvanize trade into a temporary activity that makes the superfluous traders imagine there is a necessity for more currency, and induces them to circulate petitions asking Congress to inflate the currency. The fact is that trade is not unnecessarily depressed, but there is undoubtedly an excess of traders. In proof of the statement that trade is not depressed it may be mentioned that nearly three times as much lumber was sold by Chicago dealers to the country west of this city during the month of January last as was sold during January of any previous year.

And yet I suppose the Senator from Michigan may bring to me a letter from a lumber merchant who has not sold as much as he desired to sell.

There is perhaps no branch of business transacted in this city which is so good an index to the state of trade and the financial condition of the country tributary to this city as the lumber trade. Farmers never buy lumber for fences and other improvements unless they are prosperous, and when they are so trade is good. We conclude, therefore, that the impression that trade is depressed arises from the fact that the abnormal stimulation of trade from the excessive railroad building of the ten years up to about a year ago has been withdrawn, and left trade to diminish to a legitimate, healthy volume.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. So far as the Senator has referred to the lumber interest of Chicago, I have not the official facts here; they are at my rooms, and it is not of importance enough to send there for them; but I think it may safely be said that I know more about the lumber interest of Chicago than the Senator or the writer of that article in the paper he has read.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not know anything about it, but read from one of the first papers of the West a market report on that subject.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have mingled with lumbermen, and have known something of their business for years; and I state on my responsibility here, upon the knowledge I have of my own business, and indirectly of the business of others who are operating in the same line, that lumbermen never had so dull a season within the last ten years as they have had this past fall and up to the present time, and sales have been much less than years past. As incident to this I quote from one of the land officers in Michigan, a lumbering region where entries of pine lands keep pace with the healthy condition of the money market:

The cash receipts of this institution during the last three months were $1,400. To show how Government business, as well as others, is affected by the panic, or whatever it is called, it might be incidentally stated that the receipts during the corresponding time in 1871 were over $20,000.

There, in the corresponding time, was $20,000 against $1,400. I see the Senator from Missouri smiling, and perhaps he will say that that is a single instance. I refer to it because it is immediately connected with the lumber interest of Chicago, of which the Senator has spoken. Pine lands in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin, generally sought as good investments, do not seem to invite entry where this land office is located, and is a significant indication of the money market.

Mr. SCHURZ. What is the date of that?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Last month.

Mr. SCHURZ. Why now, Mr. President, the Senator must think—does think, I see it upon his face—how excessively weak is the argument to quote, against the statement of a mercantile authority from which it appears that money is plenty there, a letter from a land office which in former years sold more than it does now. It shows simply that less money is being invested in wild-land speculation. That is all. But can you draw a conclusion from that single fact upon the general condition of the business of the country? Everybody knows that you cannot.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I wish merely to say that I put fact against statement; and whether the statement or the fact be weak, I leave the country to judge.

Mr. MORTON. I simply want to say, in answer to all these newspaper scraps, which the Senator from Missouri has so diligently collected, that they prove nothing. Some of those articles are evidently political. I see the Senator from Missouri laugh. The Senator is better at laughing than he is at arguing. I have observed that frequently. Some of those articles are evidently political on their face. But taking them as being true, which some of them are not, what do they prove? They show, what we all know to be the fact, that nearly all public enterprises are suspended; there is scarcely a railroad now in process of construction.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President——

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to go on?

Mr. SCHURZ. Certainly. I do not wish the Senator to yield to me unless it is convenient for him to do so.

Mr. MORTON. Very well; I give way.

Mr. SCHURZ. I merely wish to ask what the Senator meant by saying that some of these articles were evidently political? Does he mean that they come from republican, democratic, or other sources, and are therefore not reliable?

Mr. MORTON. I do not know what papers they come from.

Mr. SCHURZ. I have told you from the Chicago Tribune; but if it suits the Senator better I will also make the same quotation from the Inter-Ocean, and the Chicago Times. It is the same thing all the way around.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senator that he cannot produce any statement from the Inter-Ocean to prove that money is plenty in that country, that the people do not desire any more, only so far that it is easy compared with what it has been. I do say this by way of drawing from the Senator from Missouri these smiles that he imagines are produced by his experience and great knowledge; but he reads here a quotation to show that money can be borrowed at 8 or 9 per cent. now. The time has never been that you could not borrow money on call at 8 or 9 per cent. in Chicago when it was to loan, the same as you borrow money in New York at 3 or 4 per cent. on call. That does not prove that money is plenty, by any means. But I have stated time and again that on year loans you cannot borrow in that country, and I repeat that I do not believe you can to-day for less than 1½ or 2 per cent. a month. I will say to the Senator that this very morning I rode to the Navy Department with a banker from Chatsworth, Illinois, one other gentleman being with me, and this gentleman said that at that place in Illinois money was being loaned now at from 3 to 4 per cent. a month; and he is a man who ought to know that whereof he spoke.

But we are told that these statements of newpapers must be received. They prove but this: that there is no time and never has been a time when money could not be borrowed on call, if there was any money to be had, at a rate of interest of 8 or 9 per cent. But I ask the Senator from Missouri, who laughed at the Senator from Indiana when he spoke of these as political articles, does he not know that there is not an article on the money question in the Chicago Tribune, and has not been for three months, that has not been directly against the gentlemen in this Chamber and elsewhere who are in favor of an increase of the currency? Does he not know that they are all colored in that direction? Does he not know that that paper is a strict supporter of his theory of immediate resumption of specie payments; in a word, that it tries to prove that money is plenty, and has been all the time? Does he not know that even during the panic, while banks were tumbling and the people breaking in Chicago, this very paper then produced articles in reference to money that aided in and caused the suspension of some of the best banks in the city of Chicago? And yet it is produced here as authority to prove that there is plenty of money all through the country!

I do not wish to discuss this question as one depending on what any paper may say. I do not care what they may say; I do not care what the money articles are. I remember reading one in the New York Times, a republican paper, a few days ago, in which it announced to the country that the people of the West did not know anything about finance. This same Chicago Tribune, when this discussion first commenced, said that such men as MORTON and other gentlemen, naming them, were fit to be voted for by fools! And yet the Senator says that these articles do not tend in a political direction. I do not know that they tend toward democracy or republicanism, but they do tend in the direction of opposition to an increase of the currency and in favor of an immediate resumption of specie payments, because that is the theory of the paper, and all these articles tend in that direction.

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator from Indiana will yield to me just a moment. When the Senator from Illinois says that this paper is in favor of specie payments, it is quite true, and I know it. But let me tell him that the great papers of the country generally are against inflation, and in favor of as early a resumption of specie payments as possible—the great papers generally, I say, with few, if any, exceptions; and I will tell him why. Because they know that they are acting under a great responsibility in stating true facts to the country, and they have altogether too much sense to be in favor of anything else. Hence the whole leading press is in favor of specie payments and against inflation. But if he says that the statements I read from the Chicago Tribune are political articles, I will quote the Inter-Ocean, a paper which he probably prefers:

MONDAY EVENING, February 9.

There was very little change to note in the course of the local money market. Money is comparatively easy, and with a good inquiry from the grain and provision interest bankers are enabled to place the greater portion of offerings at the legal rate of interest. The mercantile branch of trade includes few borrowers, and their wants are easily supplied.

TUESDAY EVENING, February 10.

There is no particular change to note in the course of local finances. The demand for money is only moderately active, and the supply of loanable funds quite large. Operators in grain and provisions are the principal borrowers, the recent reduction in values inducing a better inquiry on speculative account. The stocks here are quite large, which has led to the reduction in prices. Money is decidedly easier, and parties can obtain accommodations readily at the legal rate of interest, though bankers generally give short-date paper the preference. The inquiry from the mercantile branch of trade is rather light, and parties succeed in obtaining all the favors they desire. On the street there is more money offering, and rates of interest rule little higher than those current at the banks.

That is the statement of the Inter-Ocean. Does that suit the Senator better?

Mr. LOGAN. I am not doubting the fact stated in any money article that the rate of interest is as stated, or that money is not easy, compared with what it was two months ago. No one questions that. What I said was this: that I defied the Senator to produce an article from the Inter-Ocean, and papers like that, stating that there was plenty of money in the country; and he has not produced any such thing.

So far as this question of ease in the money market, compared with its condition a few weeks ago, is concerned, this is not doubted; because the Treasury has been pouring out the $44,000,000 reserve, and that has been easing the money market to a certain extent. More than that: if the rate of interest is lower now than it was a few weeks ago, it only proves that if the money is increased it decreases the rate of interest, contrary to the argument of the gentleman some time since, who said that a larger amount of money would increase the rate of interest.

Now, Mr. President, I must say to the Senator from Missouri, when he talks in this Chamber with such fierceness that he expected to alarm somebody, he mistakes himself. He says that all the great papers of the country that have any sense are in favor of specie payments; therefore we are to infer that all the great men are, also; that is, himself and a few others. Greatness is not a general commodity. It is circumscribed by bounds, like the national banks, and minds of a few individuals. "All the great papers!" What great papers do you talk about, sir? The great papers! The Chicago Tribune supported Mr. Greeley in connection with the Senator from Missouri, and is therefore great in his esteem. Also the Chicago Times; that agrees with the Senator in all he says—or he agrees with it, I do not know which.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Inter-Ocean.

Mr. LOGAN. The Inter-Ocean! I beg pardon. The Inter-Ocean stands against your doctrine of specie payments at present, and is in favor of an increase of the currency; but it is not a great paper, according to the theory of the Senator. After all, what does that prove? That great papers and small papers are in favor of this or that thing. Does that prove anything? Does that prove that they are right or wrong, because some of them happen to agree with the Senator? It proves no such thing. It is a question of argument before the people, as to whether the people should be restricted in their privileges or not. Are all the great papers in this country in favor of monopolies? Will the Senator say that? Are all the great papers in this country in favor of restricting the power that belongs to money within the hands of a few people, as he is? Are all the great papers of this country in favor of the rich and against the poor; in favor of the money power; in favor of great monopolies that he speaks for, that grasp all the money in opposition to the views of the people? Is that what the great papers are for? Is that what the great men are for?

The greatness of my friend, with the great papers that stand at his back, says to the people of this country, "The banks, the moneyed power of this land, the men who have the power given to them by Congress, shall themselves wield this great influence over this nation by the power in their hands." Do they fear that a few mechanics may probably associate themselves together and form a bank for the benefit of their class of people? The Senator from Missouri in all his greatness says, "No; this privilege belongs to the great class to which I belong; you poor mechanics shall have nothing to do with it." If a few farmers desire to associate themselves together to form a bank that they may be accommodated in their own communities, the great Senator from Missouri says, "No, sirs; stand aside. This privilege, under the law of Congress, belongs to a certain select class that I am the peculiar advocate of to-day on the floor of the Senate."

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator permit me to explain?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. SCHURZ. I have not had the privilege of addressing the Senate on the question of national banks at all, that I am aware of; and if the Senator will refresh his memory only a single moment, I think he will remember that I have said nothing at all of the kind. I have not opened my lips on the question of national banks, not in a single instance.

Mr. LOGAN. Is that all?

Mr. SCHURZ. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, I will proceed, then. Sir, the language that you used on this floor was that all the papers that "had any sense were in favor of an immediate return to specie payments" and sustained you; as much as to say that all the others were fools, and that all who controverted your proposition were fools in this country.

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHURZ. I did not say that, either.

Mr. LOGAN. What did you say?

Mr. SCHURZ. Simply that the great responsible papers of this country had too much sense to be in favor of inflation——

Mr. LOGAN. Ah!

Mr. SCHURZ. And that they were in favor of as early a return to specie payments as possible. I did not mean to indicate that nobody else had sense but those papers; and if the Senator would look at all this thing calmly, with that spirit of kindness which we are in the habit of using in debate, I think he would not make the mistakes that he has made as to what I said and what I did.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, inasmuch as the Senator from Illinois seems not to be endowed with the spirit of kindness that the Senator from Missouri is, I suppose I ought to be forgiven for my want of that peculiarity that belongs to himself.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not hesitate for a moment to forgive the Senator on the spot. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. Now, I will see for a moment what the Senator from Missouri did say, and see whether his language carries with it something offensive or not. All the great papers in the country have too much sense to be for anything but a resumption of specie payments; that was his language. What does he mean by that? All the papers of sense are for that, and all the papers without sense are against it. Is not that what it means? Therefore all Senators who are for that proposition are Senators with sense, and all the Senators who are against that proposition are Senators without sense; I ask if that is not the meaning of the language used by the Senator?

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator wants an explanation of my language, I am ready to give it to him.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not ask it. I asked if that was his meaning?

Mr. SCHURZ. I will just state the meaning of my language.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. SCHURZ. I advocated a certain line of policy. I should not have advocated that line of policy had I not thought that that line of policy was more sensible than the other side. Therefore advocating that line of policy, I believe that those who go with me in that direction are more sensible than those who do not; and if I understand the Senator from Illinois rightly, he is subject to that same weakness.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. I am very sorry to say that the Senator's opinion of himself is not appreciated by the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator will permit me to say that I am very glad to know that the Senator's opinion of himself is appreciated by the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. I am very glad to know it too.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the galleries that applause or laughter is out of order.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator and myself agree precisely on these two propositions. Now I will say that the Senator from Missouri must not imagine, inasmuch as he has made himself the great leader in this fight, that he can stand on this Senate floor and crush every man out of existence. Other men have the same rights here and the same privileges that he has. When he casts these insinuations about sense, he may think it is fine language to be used in the Senate. Perhaps it is. He may think it is gentle and moderate and nice and splendid to be used here by a gentleman of reputation as an orator of classic attainments. He may think that his repartee will win for him golden laurels. He may imagine that he has the power of Jove, just come down from Mount Olympus, to send his thunderbolts through the Senate Chamber. He may have all these imaginations in reference to himself; but unless he can sustain them by argument, they are worth but very little before the Senate or before the country.

I have said these things because I have been provoked into it by the remarks of the Senator alluding to the want of sense in papers and people. I had no idea of entering into this discussion at all, but merely rose to say and to reiterate what I have said, that I received the information I have stated before the Senate time and time again as to the rate of interest in the country, generally in the West, especially in my State; and to state the fact that I was reminded this morning, by a gentlemen with whom I rode to the Navy Department, of the same state of affairs that I have mentioned heretofore in the Senate, and I give it to the Senate for what it is worth.

Mr. SCHURZ. I want to detain the Senator from Indiana only a single moment to say one word. The Senator from Illinois must be aware that nothing could be further from my desire than to get up a quarrel with him. Nothing in the world was further from my mind; and I do not think there was the least occasion for all the magnificent noise and fury he indulged himself in, since I did nothing but quote the market reports of the Chicago Tribune. If the facts contained in these market reports are such as to confute the argument of the gentlemen on the other side, it is the fault of the facts and not mine. Therefore my good friend and myself should not lose our equanimity, for I can assure him that I am not responsible for those facts which so violently disturb him.

Mr. MORTON. At the time I was interrupted by the Senator from Missouri I was about to say, or did say, that nearly all public enterprises in this country were suspended. There is scarcely a railroad now being constructed anywhere in the United States. Very many are left in a half finished condition. The iron works furnishing iron to lay those roads are also suspended, and a great many branches of industry connected with railroads are suspended. From the scraps of newspapers read by the Senator from Missouri it appears that there is a general depression. I believe the remark in several was, a very great depression of the manufacturing interest. That is so in Illinois, in Iowa, in Indiana, in Missouri, in Pennsylvania, in Ohio, and everywhere else.

Mr. President, there is the same volume of money in the country to-day that there was before the panic; but there is not the same amount of business to use it. A great many branches of business that were using money on the 15th of September are now not using a dollar; they are suspended.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And therefore less is required.

Mr. MORTON. Less is required just now. Why? Because business is suspended and partially broken down; but is that an argument to prove that we have got enough money? There may be enough to-day, but that does not prove that there is enough when business has been revived. It comes directly short; and there is the fallacy of the argument of the Senator from Missouri. I will take his own city of Saint Louis——

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President——

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to go on?

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator speaks of my argument. I did not make any.

Mr. MORTON. I refer to the city of Saint Louis. I think I may say that a very considerable portion of the manufacturing business of Saint Louis is suspended to-day. They are not using money. They were large borrowers in good times, and now they do not borrow at all. How is it with your iron works at Carondelet, five miles below your city? I believe nearly all were suspended a few weeks ago, and a part of them are now suspended, as I am informed. So with regard to a great many other branches of business in that city; they are not borrowers now because they are crushed for the time being. But the Senator uses that as an argument to prove that money is plenty! Sir, when business is broken down in the country of course that business is not using money; the money is then lying idle for the time being; but is that an argument to prove that money is plenty and the volume of currency large enough? Will it be large enough when times have revived and business again springs up as it existed only last fall?

The answer made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] was a complete answer to the whole thing. Why was money plenty in the city of New York yesterday? Why can it be had there at a comparatively low rate of interest? Because it is not demanded elsewhere, and because the demand for money in New York to-day is small; hundreds and thousands of men are out of employment everywhere, marching in columns through the streets and asking for bread; manufactories, works of every kind, are suspended to a greater or less degree everywhere; not using money because they cannot. And because money is lying idle from this cause we are told that money is plenty! That is the kind of fallacy resorted to by my friend from Missouri.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Does the Senator from Indiana think it would improve the condition of labor to have more money lying idle?

Mr. MORTON. Ah, Mr. President, that does not meet the point at all. There is a revival of business going on partially, the result of the fact that the Government has put twenty-seven millions of additional legal-tenders into circulation; but business cannot be revived successfully on the old volume of currency. The wants of the country have been growing. There has been a growing stringency for the last four or five years. While the volume of currency has not been increased the volume of business has, and this stricture has been increasing from day to day. I would ask my friend from Vermont what is the definition of "money;" what is the meaning of "money?" It is a medium of exchange. It is the instrument of buying and selling. That is the simple definition of it; and as exchange increases, as the amount to be bought and sold increases, so is there an increased use for money and you want a little more of it. When there is but little business doing comparatively, as there is now, there is less use for money than when there is a large business doing.

Mr. President, I have been betrayed into saying more on this point than I intended.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, there are two statements made by the Senator from Indiana to which I wish to call his attention, more for the purpose of getting an answer from him than of making an argument. In speaking of the various communities in which business is now depressed or business enterprises are suspended, he mentions Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. His statement, I suppose, is in a measure correct. There are many business enterprises suspended in those States. He made another statement, however, which bears upon the present condition of the country. It was this: that there is as much money in the country to-day as there was before the suspension.

Mr. MORTON. As much currency.

Mr. SCOTT. As much currency in the country as there was before the suspension of business. Business was being successfully conducted upon the volume of currency that we had before the suspension, and I would ask him, therefore, whether there is not another element crippling the business of the country than the want of the currency? Is it not the want of confidence—the distrust, not of the currency, but of banks and bankers? And would it not be found so if he had before him a statement of the condition of the banks throughout the whole country? I have not that before me at this moment, but I venture the assertion that the state of the banks throughout the country would show that from 25 to 33 per cent. of the deposits which they held before the 18th of last September have been withdrawn and have not found their way back yet. It is true the deposits are large in the Atlantic cities—in New York, Philadelphia, and elsewhere; but take the state of the deposits throughout the interior, and it shows that the community has not yet recovered from the shock which their confidence received by the suspensions of the 18th of September and those which followed it. The money, the currency, is hoarded just as much as gold was hoarded in former times. The banks in the regions where industrial enterprises were in progress cannot give the accommodations that they could before the suspensions occurred. And it is that element that has as much to do with the tardiness of revival of business as the want of an increased paper currency.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. MORTON. May I make a suggestion?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The statement of the Senator in regard to the withdrawal of deposits and the failure to return them is true. There are not deposits to the same extent there were before the panic; consequently there is not the same amount of money to loan that there was before the panic; there is not the same abundance of money to be loaned as there was before the panic; and that is the answer to the Senator from Missouri. There is less business now to demand money than there was before the panic, and that my friend from Pennsylvania himself will not dispute.

Mr. SCHURZ. If my friend from Pennsylvania will allow me to ask a question. The Senator from Indiana says that there is not the same amount of money to loan. Is not the same amount of money in existence?

Mr. MORTON. My friend from Pennsylvania says it is hoarded; there is the answer.

Mr. SCOTT. Let me put a question to my friend from Indiana in answer to his suggestion. He admits that the want of confidence has led to the hoarding of money, and that is the reason why business enterprises are suspended. Does he suppose that it will inspire confidence to issue more paper money? Will the people who are hoarding it now scatter it broadcast if they get it by issuing more?

Mr. MORTON. That has always been the result.

Mr. SCOTT. I recall two similes used by the Senator in the early period of this debate, when he and I were laboring for a common purpose, as I doubt not we are yet, however we may differ as to the means, to secure a proper measure of relief for the business interests of the country. One was that he had often seen a load which was stuck in the mud taken out by putting an additional horse to the team; and all he wanted in the business embarrassment of the country at that time was the additional horse. He used another, which I may as well state now: that when the well was dry and the sucker only a little out of order, all that was needed was a bucket of water to pour in and start the pump, and you might supply the family with water for a whole day. I think the debate here has brought out the fact that the Senate are willing to give him the horse if he will give assurance that when returned to the stable he will not be diminished 10 per cent. in value; or we will give him the bucket of water if we have the assurance that by starting the pump we shall not flood the whole neighborhood. We are in danger of an inundation upon this subject of an irredeemable paper currency.

I was willing with the Senator, when we came here, if we could have done it at once, to have released the banks from the reserve on circulation, for the purpose of giving him the horse, or the bucket of water to pour upon the stagnant wheels of business. That would have been utilizing existing currency, not increasing it. But while we have been debating this question, confidence has been gradually restored; and the increased deposits going to New York and Philadelphia give the evidence that the people are again willing, at least to some extent, to place the money now in circulation where it may be used for business purposes. I hope we shall get a preventive that will stop it from flowing to Philadelphia or New York, simply for the purpose of speculation; but I am not willing to pass by the remark of the Senator from Indiana, about prostrate business and the supply of money, without calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that it is not so much the want of a sufficient amount of circulating medium that prevents the revival of business enterprises as it is the want of that confidence which received such a terrible shock by the suspensions of the 18th of September and those following it, and without suggesting that the then existing state of the currency may have had much to do with producing the speculations that led to those suspensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] to the instructions proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The original question being on the motion of Mr. BUCKINGHAM, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Finance, a motion was made by Mr. MERRIMON to amend the motion to recommit the bill by adding thereto, "and that the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, instructed to report as soon as practicable a bill providing for the increase of the national-bank circulation, so the whole volume thereof shall not exceed $400,000,000." A motion has been made by Mr. SCOTT to amend the proposed amendment, by inserting at the end thereof, "and providing for the redemption of the whole national-bank currency in specie or the interest-bearing bonds of the United States."

The question is on this amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senate is not full, and I think this is a question on which we should have a full Senate. I prefer that the vote should be taken to-morrow. Unless that course be agreed to by common consent, I will move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will not do that. He has already given notice of a motion for to-morrow. I do not want this to be deferred until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I feel it my duty to state that the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BROWNLOW,] is not in his seat, and he has left on account of his condition, and on the supposition that no vote would be taken to-day. In justice to him the Senate ought, I think, to give him an opportunity to reach here, or else fix a time to-morrow when the vote shall be taken, so that he can be present. It seems to me it is due to the Senator, in his condition of health, for it is impossible for him to stay here and await the action of the Senate.

I have deemed it my duty to say this much, and I leave the Senate to take such course as they deem best.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. HOWE. I rise to inquire whether it would be in order now to move the amendment of which I gave notice to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not be in order until the present motion is disposed of.

Mr. SCOTT. The question is on my amendment to the proposed instruction.

Mr. HOWE. I beg pardon; I thought it was the amendment of the Senator's colleague.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. SCOTT to the amendment of Mr. MERRIMON.

Mr. BOREMAN. There is, I apprehend, not a member of this body who is not in favor of resuming specie payments at some time, and yet there are some who do not think this is a very propitious time to inaugurate resumption. This proposition, it seems to me, is so indefinite that it is very difficult for us to express our views properly; in other words, we shall be misunderstood whether we vote one way or the other, unless we are for resumption instanter. The amendment is:

And providing for the redemption of the whole national-bank currency in specie or the interest-bearing bonds of the United States.

That instruction is so general that it leaves the committee to make this resumption commence at once or commence five years hence.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will all be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BOREMAN. It will be reported to the Senate, but then we shall have another squabble for weeks over that, some being for immediate resumption, some for resumption next year, and some for it four or five years hence.

Mr. MORTON. The amendment means resumption instanter, undoubtedly.

Mr. BOREMAN. If this means immediate resumption, (and that is the only construction I can give to it,) I shall be compelled to vote against it. If there was some time in the future fixed for this action, I might probably vote for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] to the instructions proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLANAGAN, (when his name was called.) I have agreed to pair with the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. DORSEY. If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. GORDON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, Mr. BAYARD. If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, Mr. INGALLS. I should vote "yea," and he would vote "nay," if he were present.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, Mr. INGALLS. If he were present he would vote against the proposition, and I should vote for it.

Mr. CONKLING. How many are paired with the same Senator?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. If the Senator from Texas has paired with the Senator from Kansas, I vote "yea."

Mr. HITCHCOCK, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, Mr. EDMUNDS. He would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. SARGENT, (when his name was called.) I supposed I was paired with the Senator from Kansas, Mr. INGALLS, who was called home by sickness in his family. The Senator from Texas [Mr. HAMILTON] announced that he was paired with him. My friend on my left [Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland,] also supposed that he was paired with him. The Senator from Texas is willing to remain paired with him. Of course there can be but one pair, and under the circumstances I consider myself released from the pair, and therefore vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. RANSOM. If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Sumner, and Wadleigh—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Howe, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Thurman, Tipton, West, and Wright—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Brownlow, Conover, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Lewis, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Windom—15.

So the amendment of Mr. SCOTT to the proposed instructions was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the instructions moved by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] as an amendment to the motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMERON. Now, Mr. President, I see the Senate is not full by any means, and this is a very important question. It will affect the country for years. I trust, therefore, that we shall now adjourn, and take this vote to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust we shall not adjourn, and I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have a division first.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I will withdraw the demand for a moment until a division can be had.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. STEWART. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Let the amendment be reported.

Mr. MORTON. I was going to suggest that the last roll-call showed the absence of some sixteen Senators.

Mr. SHERMAN. They were all paired.

Mr. MORTON. Not all of them. There are some Senators absent who are not paired, and who did not expect the vote to be taken to-day, but who will be here in the morning. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] was here a little while ago, but has gone. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CONOVER] is absent, and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] is absent. The latter did not expect the vote to be taken to-day.

Mr. HOWE. Am I to understand that the amendment moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON] is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. HOWE. Then I propose to move the amendment of which I gave notice as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And that the said committee be further instructed to make provision that the Secretary of the Treasury shall, once in each month, sell to the highest bidders, for United States notes, coupon bonds equal to 85 per cent. of the additional bank circulation issued during the month preceding, which bonds shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, and the principal shall be payable at the pleasure of the Government after ten years from their date, both principal and interest to be paid in gold coin; but none of said bonds shall be sold at less than their par value, and the United States notes received in exchange therefor shall never be reissued, but shall be destroyed.

Mr. HOWE. Now, I wish to make one suggestion in reply to a remark made by the Senator from Indiana. I regret that we have not before the Senate now the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON;] that we have not an unlimited banking proposition before us, instead of a restrictive one; but if the Senate shall agree to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina up to the amount named there, every section of the country can have just as much banking circulation as capital is willing to supply. It seems to me that while the Senator from Indiana may be entirely right in supposing that there is a large portion of the country who think we have not greenbacks enough, yet the men who hold the greenbacks know better about that than the men who do not; and if the fact is that men are carrying these greenbacks who would rather have an obligation of the Government paying 5 per cent. interest than to carry these notes without interest, or to loan these notes to anybody else, what possible reason can we assign, other than a wish to repudiate, for not allowing them to convert them into a 5 per cent. bond?

Mr. MORTON. The effect of the two amendments taken together is that the committee shall be instructed to report a bill increasing the national-bank circulation $46,000,000, or up to the amount of $400,000,000 altogether, and that an amount of greenbacks shall be retired, by being funded into a 5 per cent. bond, equal to 85 per cent. of the $46,000,000, as fast as the $46,000,000 may be called for. It presents the distinct question to the Senate of retiring a portion of the greenback circulation now outstanding. It presents the distinct question of converting a portion of our greenback circulation into an interest-bearing bond.

Mr. SCOTT. At 5 per cent.?

Mr. MORTON. A 5 per cent. bond. It presents the distinct question of confining the volume of the currency to exactly what it is now.

Mr. MERRIMON. It goes much further than that. As I understand this amendment, if it shall prevail and a law shall pass carrying it into effect, it not only retires the greenbacks, but it only increases the volume of circulation—the money circulation—in the country 15 per cent.

Mr. MORTON. It does not increase it that amount, as I understand that the volume of greenbacks to be retired is only 85 per cent. of $46,000,000. The reason of that, I presume, is that the Senator counts on the reserve. The $46,000,000 will require, on an average, 25 per cent. reserve instead of 15 per cent. The Senator only allows for 15 per cent., but the average reserve will be over 25 per cent., if we take the returns of the banks heretofore; so that there would be a positive contraction of the difference between the 15 per cent. and the 25 per cent. on the $46,000,000.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the reserve is 15 per cent. outside of the cities. I assume that no portion of this new banking circulation would go to the cities, and therefore I deducted but 15 per cent., which is just the reserve.

Mr. MORTON. Let me suggest to the Senator that the amount of reserve under the law, outside of the cities, is 15 per cent. on circulation and 15 per cent. on deposits, which makes 30 per cent. The average of deposits, I believe, is nearly equal to the circulation. I am not sure about that, but I think it approaches it very nearly.

Mr. STEWART. On what does it make 30 per cent.? Fifteen per cent. on deposits and 15 per cent. on circulation?

Mr. MORTON. If you put the two together they would make 30 per cent.

Mr. CONKLING. Thirty per cent. on what?

Mr. MORTON. It would require an amount of greenbacks to be called out of circulation and put into the vaults of the banks as their reserve equal to 15 per cent. on circulation and 15 per cent. on deposits, and if the deposits are equal to the circulation, which they are likely to be, then the whole amount of the reserve to be put into the vaults of the banks, to be taken out of the greenbacks now in circulation, would be 30 per cent. of the $46,000,000; so that it would be a retirement in that form of another 30 per cent.

Mr. BOGY. I think it is only 15 per cent. on $46,000,000, which would be $6,900,000.

Mr. THURMAN. If there were to be an increase of national-bank currency to the extent of $46,000,000 and no more, and the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin were adopted, the result would be simply this: that the volume of currency in the country would be increased $6,900,000; an increase which I imagine would afford very little relief in the opinion of those who think the panacea for all our evils is more paper money; but then its effect would not stop there. While it would be wholly inefficient to afford relief, if relief could only be afforded by an increase of currency, it would impose upon this Government the payment of $2,000,000 annually in the shape of interest, or very nearly that, $1,950,000. That is to say, for the privilege of having $6,900,000 additional currency, the Government is to agree to pay $1,950,000 interest per annum, in order to retire a currency with which the whole people are satisfied.

Mr. HOWE. I have been painfully conscious of that defect in this proposition of mine, that it would call upon the United States to pay a little interest on their debts, if the holders of the non-interest paying debt asked for it; but I thought the people of the United States had integrity enough left to consent to that. I did not think I should encounter here in the Senate statesmen who would insist upon the people carrying this dishonored paper simply for the purpose of saving so low a rate of interest as 5 per cent. Therefore I ventured to offer the proposition. But Senators suggest to me that instead of asking a vote of the Senate upon this proposition as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, I should move, as a substitute for his amendment, the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, with my amendment added; and I inquire of the Chair if that would be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin can modify his motion to that effect. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his present motion. The question will then be on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina. The Senator from Wisconsin can now move any substitute for that he pleases.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Have not the Senate ordered the yeas and nays on the other proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have not.

Mr. HOWE. I move as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] with my amendment added thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his amendment, and moves now, as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania and his own as one measure.

Mr. ALCORN. I will inquire whether that amendment, in its present attitude, is divisible?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. ALLISON. I will inquire whether or not an amendment to the substitute is in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not. This is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin offers his original proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin has withdrawn the amendment which he offered to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. He now changes it by moving a substitute for it, which is in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. And not amendable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And not amendable until disposed of by a vote.

Mr. DAVIS, and Mr. FERRY of Michigan. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of Mr. MERRIMON is to add to the motion to refer the following instructions:

That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, instructed to report, as soon as practicable, a bill providing for the increase of the national-bank circulation so that the whole volume thereof shall not exceed $400,000,000.

It is proposed to amend that amendment so as to make it read:

That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, instructed to report as soon as practicable a bill providing that so much of the twenty-second section of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and of the several acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, and such of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, and so much of such parts of any other act or acts of Congress as limit or as may be construed to limit or restrict the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under the act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that hereafter all associations organized, or that may be organized, for carrying on the business of banking under the provisions of said act shall be free to establish and organize national banks with circulation at any place within the several States and Territories of the United States upon the terms and conditions, and subject to all the limitations and restrictions now provided by law, except the limitation upon the entire amount of circulation, which is hereby repealed. And also providing that the Secretary of the Treasury shall, once in each month, sell to the highest bidder for United States notes, coupon bonds equal to 85 per cent. of the additional bank circulation issued during the month preceding, which bonds shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent., payable quarterly, and the principal shall be payable at the pleasure of the Government, after ten years from their date; both principal and interest to be paid in gold coin; but none of said bonds shall be sold at less than their par value; and the United States notes received in exchange therefor shall never be reissued, but shall be destroyed.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to throw myself upon the indulgence of the Senate once more. I think this last change of front of mine was a mistake, and I want to resume my original position. I think I will renew the motion I first made, moving my amendment as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina; and on that I think I will take the sense of the Senate upon the expediency of retiring or funding greenbacks as fast as the national-bank-note currency is increased; and then if that fails, we can get the sense of the Senate upon the question of increasing the national-bank-note currency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws the pending amendment which he offered as a substitute, and renews the amendment which he had formerly offered to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not like to differ from the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, and it is very seldom that I do; but I think he does not—or if he does, I do not—appreciate the result of his amendment. If I understand it, it is to withdraw the national circulation, the legal-tender notes, and substitute therefor bank-notes, and I suppose he has reference to a final redemption in coin, for I certainly think he is one of the most earnest men in the Senate in behalf of specie redemption. I wish to say to the honorable Senator that I think if he adheres to that proposition, and if the Senate shall vote for it, before you see specie redemption, or at the time you see specie redemption, you will see a contraction of the currency such as you do not now appreciate. For instance, suppose to-day all the legal-tender notes were retired and bank-notes placed in circulation, and you should require the banks to meet their obligations and redeem their notes in coin, how could they do it? They could only do it by going into the market and purchasing the coin. That would be right; for they are under obligations to redeem, and therefore they should redeem at any cost. But suppose they should go into the market and buy coin and redeem their notes and pay the present market value, or one-half that, I ask you if they would put those notes in circulation again?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to ask the Senator whether he does not know that the banks of the city of New York at the present moment have 12 or 15 per cent. more of specie than they have out in circulation, so that for the largest city in the country, containing the largest amount of banking capital, they have an excess to-day of something like 12 or 15 per cent. of coin in their vaults above their circulation?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I did not know it was that amount; but I say this: Whoever takes that coin takes from those banks 10 per cent. more than he takes when he takes their notes; and if they begin to redeem, the moment they redeem and pay that premium for coin to redeem their notes, I say distinctly that those banks will issue no more currency to be redeemed by the purchase of coin at such a rate; and therefore, if that specie redemption were continued—it would not be; but if it should be continued, there would be a curtailment as a matter of absolute necessity; and no legislation can prevent it.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not want to deal in predictions. I said yesterday, I repeat to-day, that I know very well a bank cannot pay four dollars with one; but I think I know that long before your greenbacks are retired under this proposition they will be at par with specie in the country. I think I know one other thing: if to-day you had no Government notes on the market, but all the paper in circulation had been issued by the banks, I do not believe there would be the slightest danger of a run being made upon the banks, and for this plain reason—who would make the run? For every dollar of bank-paper the community will have in its pockets the bank has more than a dollar of the commercial paper of the country, and if for purposes of speculation combinations make a run upon the banks with their notes for redemption, the banks will say, "Why, gentlemen, yes; to-day you ask us to pay our paper in specie; to-morrow your paper falls due, and you must pay specie," for the Government cannot any longer intervene between the clients of the banks and the banks themselves. When that time comes, manifestly to me the banks will be called upon to furnish only so much specie as the business of the country absolutely demands, and that amount of specie they not only will be able to furnish then, but they are furnishing to-day, did yesterday, and have done every day during the past ten years.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest to my friend that no bank can be put into operation without furnishing an amount equal to the capital in specie to-day under any of these propositions. They must buy the bonds, and the bonds are worth their par in specie.

Mr. HOWE. They are not specie, but they are worth the specie.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And will bring it anywhere.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to say simply that I shall vote for this amendment, without giving any intimation whatever how I would vote upon it as a separate and distinct measure. I shall do so because I shall subsequently vote against any instructions to the committee, and I think this debate and the precise attitude the question is now in before the Senate ought to convince us all that we ought to recommit the bill without any embarrassment.

Mr. SCHURZ. The position I occupy with regard to this amendment is exactly the position just now defined by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust we shall vote this proposition down. I desire to get my proposition plainly and simply before the Senate. After it shall have met the approbation of the Senate, I shall be willing to consider propositions of amendment; but I think the effect of all these amendments is only to embarrass the main question, and I trust we shall vote this one down.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to say that I cannot vote for this amendment. It contains in it a principle which, if extended, brings this country by steady and certain processes to bankruptcy; and whether the instructions are to fall or to succeed, I cannot put myself upon record in favor of a proposition which contains a principle by which every business man in this country is to be destroyed if it be applied generally to the financial system of the country.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend state how?

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is a process by which you increase the demand for legal-tender notes and diminish the supply—that is the peculiarity of it—by which the business of the country must be brought to ruin.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I spoke of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] simply because I preferred it as attached to the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I wish he had not withdrawn it, but had allowed those two to have gone as a substitute for the whole. As he has withdrawn it, I do not hesitate to say that his amendment attached to the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina would, in my judgment, improve the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, and therefore, unless I change my mind, I shall vote for his amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina; but then I shall reserve the privilege of voting against them both.

Mr. HOWE. I have a word to say in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] I agree with him that the objection he has stated to this amendment of mine is a very grave one; that if it is going to place the business of the United States face to face with bankruptcy and destruction he ought not to vote for it, and I would not vote for it if I believed that. But he is right or wrong in that prediction of his. If he is wrong, it should not stand in the way of his vote; if he is right, then this is the attitude of the country: that that medicine which you now call greenbacks, and which you persuaded the country to take some twelve years ago with shrinking and with reluctance, and only because the country stood then on the verge of bankruptcy and could not be relieved from it in any other way—that vile drug has become now a necessity of the American people. When you are restored to health you take this medicine because you have come to love it. If that is the condition of the country to-day, that will be the condition of the country ten years hence also. These unredeemed, dishonored promises of the Government have become essential to the business life of the country.

Mr. STEWART. That is the way with opium-eaters.

Mr. HOWE. My friend says that is the way with opium-eaters. Yes, I have known many a man, after he had taken two or three swigs, labor under the hallucination that he must have more drink. That seems to be the condition of the country to-day. Business is a little drunk with this dishonored paper, and Senators are divided; some of them think, to get sober, we must take more; and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts thinks it is not worth while to take any more; if you can stagger under what you have got you will do well, but by no means give up a drop you have already swallowed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I very much regret to be the occasion of prolonging this debate, and I know very well the Senate is anxious to come to a final decision, and I am, I think, among the most anxious. I interposed the observation with reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, because it has been the habit of my life, in legislative assemblies, not to vote for an amendment to a proposition in the way of changing it perniciously, with the intention of voting against the main proposition contained in the amendment.

My position, I suppose, is perfectly well understood. I consider inflation and forcible contraction alike dangerous to the country. There is one observation made in a treatise on political economy by a German once resident in this country, then returning to his home, published some years since, that there is nothing in the way of principle in the science of political economy that is applicable at all times to all nations, but that the science of political economy, so far as it is a science, is national and not cosmopolitan. I believe that the great error of the present moment is the tendency of men to rely upon what are declared or have been declared to be principles with reference to other countries and other conditions of peoples, not applicable at this time to ourselves. I should like to borrow, as an illustration or example of what I have in mind, one of the greatest questions ever put to mankind, by Colburn, in his First Lessons of Intellectual Arithmetic, to the child: How many thumbs have you on your right hand? I am inclined to look at things around us and to take counsel of what is within our own knowledge, paying due respect to what has been said by others in other times and under a different condition of things.

Now we do see that we have in this country, barring the circumstance that our paper money is not redeemable in coin, a good currency. It is of universal value; it is of a value which can be ascertained at any time and in every place. We do know that we have an excess of this currency as measured by coin; and we do know, if we have the faculty of observation, I think, that the price of every article of property increased in proportion to this excess. Now that we have eliminated from the question the fact that for a time the public credit of the country was impaired, what remains of difference between coin and paper in the markets of the world does measure the excess of paper over coin. I am opposed, as I have said before, to expansion for that reason; I am opposed to contraction; but above all am I opposed to any measure of contraction that is not open, clear, defined, precise, so that it can be understood. If we are to contract the currency, whether of national-bank notes or of greenbacks, let us do it by a distinct regulation as to the amount and the time when.

The proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin will have this effect: by increasing the volume of national-bank notes under the law requiring the national banks to keep a reserve of United States notes, you increase the demand, and at the same time he proposes to diminish the supply. During the panic last autumn something like one-half of 1 per cent. premium was paid in New York indirectly for United States notes, representing the value of those notes over and above national-bank notes. This proposition will increase the tendency. Whenever United States notes, by any process, become so valuable as compared with national-bank notes that it shall be an object for brokers to speculate in them, you close up the entire volume of United States notes precisely as though for the moment they were struck out of existence. They no longer circulate when they become valuable as an article of merchandise, and the tendency of this measure is unquestionably in that direction.

Mr. HOWE. Will not the honorable Senator be good enough to give an answer to these two questions: first, whether coin will not supply every office that greenbacks now supply; and, secondly, whether coin, if the greenbacks were out of the way, would not take their place; and I will add this third, whether coin could not be supported by the country just as cheaply as the greenbacks are?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, the answer to these two questions is perfectly plain. Coin would take the place of greenbacks if we had the coin, but we have not the coin, and no person has yet suggested a way by which we can obtain it that is practicable. Therefore, the policy of driving the country at once to the transaction of all its business upon a coin basis, is to contract the business of the country to the basis which the volume of coin supplies. Therefore, it is reaching specie payments by the prostration of the industries of the country and the impoverishment of the people.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I know a disadvantage I labor under in this debate. I am talking against experience; I am talking against authority; but after all I am compelled to talk. [Laughter.]

The Senator objects now that coin could supply the office of greenbacks if we had the coin; but we have not got it, and nobody has pointed out how we can get it. I will venture to tell the Senator how I think we can get it. The capital buried in your greenbacks to-day, if it could be drawn out, would place coin there instead. The capital which is buried in your greenbacks, once drawn out, would bring the coin necessary to supply the place of it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, (at four o'clock and fifty-six minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. No, no; let us vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SCHURZ. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and let us have a rising vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would prefer having the yeas and nays. I do not want to consume any more time on this subject.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Clayton, Fenton, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones, McCreery, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Stevenson, Stockton, Sumner, West, and Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Howe, Kelly, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Thurman, Tipton, and Wadleigh—35.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Conover, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ingalls, Lewis, Ransom, Sprague, and Windom—10.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.]

Mr. THURMAN. I only wish to say that everything that has occurred this evening serves to confirm me in the opinion I expressed yesterday, that the best thing the Senate can do is to recommit this bill to the Committee on Finance without instructions, because it does seem to me that any attempt to agree upon any instructions in the Senate upon a subject so vast and varied and complicated, and about which there is such diversity of opinion, will be in the end unsatisfactory and a failure. Therefore, without regard to the abstract or intrinsic merits of any amendment that may be offered, I shall vote against any instructions whatsoever, and vote to send this bill back to the committee, unless the Senate will do what I think would be better than that—pass the bill. I think the bill as it came from the committee might well be passed. At the same time that I would agree, and perhaps would prefer, that the amount of currency to be redistributed should be somewhat larger than $25,000,000, and I might be willing even to go to the extent of $50,000,000 after a full consideration of the matter, still I am willing to take the judgment of the committee upon that subject, especially as that executes the will of the Senate, or rather the will of Congress as expressed in the act passed four years ago, which has remained unexecuted to this day. I advocated that measure with what little, feeble ability I had. I was convinced of its soundness and wisdom then. I am equally convinced of its wisdom and its justice now. It has remained unexecuted for four years; it ought to be executed; and therefore I should prefer that the Senate, instead of recommitting this bill, should pass it as it came from the committee.

But if the Senate will not pass it; if it is to be loaded down with all manner of amendments, and we are to rediscuss the whole subject of banking, currency, finance, and commerce upon this bill, or upon any other bill that the committee can bring in, then I say let us recommit the bill and let the committee report all the measures which in its wisdom the exigency requires, and I believe that that will be the only practicable method of getting at a solution of these questions. I repeat, I shall vote against all instructions to the committee, without regard to their intrinsic merits, so as to leave it to the committee to report such measures as in its wisdom it thinks are required; and when they shall be reported I shall not hesitate to express my opinion upon them, not by harping at this provision or that provision, not by picking flaws here and there, but by speaking upon them in as broad and as catholic a spirit as any Senator ought to speak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LOGAN. I call for the yeas and nays. ["O, no!"] I withdraw the call.

Mr. HOWE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, Mr. EDMUNDS.

The call having been concluded,

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. On this question my colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, Mr. HITCHCOCK.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. CLAYTON. He is for what is commonly called inflation, and I am opposed to it; and therefore, as an amendment to the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, I should vote "yea" on this motion, and I take it for granted he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Stewart, Sumner, and Wadleigh—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Hager, Harvey, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Spencer, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, West, and Wright—40.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Conover, Dorsey, Edmunds, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Lewis, Ransom, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, and Windom—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I move, as a substitute for the proposition as it now stands, that the committee be required to bring in a bill which will provide for free banking, for funding legal-tender notes in United States bonds, and for the redemption of United States bonds in legal-tender notes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORTON and Mr. CAMERON rose.

Mr. MORTON. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON. I now move my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, instructed to report as soon as practicable a bill providing as follows:

That so much of section 22 of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and of the several acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, and such of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, and so much of such parts of any other act or acts of Congress as limit, or as may be construed to limit or restrict, the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under the said act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that hereafter all associations organized, or that may be organized, for carrying on the business of banking under the provisions of said act shall be free to establish and organize national banks with circulation at any place within the several States and Territories of the United States, upon the terms and conditions and subject to the limitations and restrictions now provided by law, except the limitation upon the entire amount of circulation, which is hereby repealed.

Mr. MORTON. In view of the fact that the Senate is not full, and several Senators are absent, not expecting a vote to be taken to-night, and in view of the fact that it is desirable that this vote shall be taken when the Senate is full, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not.

Mr. MORTON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 37, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Conover, Cooper, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Stockton, Sumner, Tipton, West, and Wright—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamlin, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Thurman, and Wadleigh—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Davis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Hamilton of Texas, Ingalls, Lewis, Ransom, Sprague, and Windom—11.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and twenty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 18, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

GREEN BAY AND LAKE MICHIGAN SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask unanimous consent to take up and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. No. 447) extending the time for the completion of the Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-canal, in the State of Wisconsin. This bill has the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill was read. It provides that the time for the completion of the Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-canal be extended to the 10th day of April, 1876.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] whether this land grant is being used to construct a canal for the benefit of a private corporation, or is it to be a free canal for the whole people?

Mr. SAWYER. It is to be a free canal for the whole people whenever the money put into the enterprise by the company is refunded.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that a condition of the original grant?

Mr. SAWYER. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman inform the House how much of this canal is already completed?

Mr. SAWYER. About one-quarter. There was originally a grant of two hundred acres of land. That grant has had one renewal; but the company were unable to organize under the grant; and they have now no organization. They have put into this enterprise their own money, and have completed one-quarter of the canal without using any of the land whatever. When completed this will make one of the best harbors of refuge; and it is very important for the interests of the lake commerce that the work should be finished as soon as possible. There is no harbor of refuge upon the shore of that lake from Manitou Island to Milwaukee or Chicago, a distance of three hundred miles. A survey was made for a harbor of refuge farther south than this; but when this project was brought up the other was abandoned. The Government has expended $40,000 during the last year on the harbor on the lake side; and $40,000 more will complete it. This will be one of the very best harbors of refuge, as it will be sufficient to hold the entire shipping of the lakes.

Mr. HOLMAN. As everybody here understands, I am opposed to these land grants. The only redeeming quality in this project is, that the grant does not inure to the benefit of the company. I shall not object to the bill coming before the House for consideration. But I certainly think these grants ought not to be revived.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be regarded as before the House for consideration.

Mr. STORM. I object.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. LAMAR. I am represented in the Journal as not voting on the call of the yeas and nays on the resolution of the majority of the Committee on Elections in the Arkansas contested-election case of Wilshire vs. Gunter. I voted in the negative, and ask to have the Journal corrected in that respect.

The Journal was corrected accordingly.

WASHINGTON CITY AND POINT LOOKOUT RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. HALE, of New York, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, by unanimous consent, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 274) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend their railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Mr. HALE, of New York, also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back the following resolution with amendments:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the Government Printer be instructed to print five thousand copies of the report of John M. Woodworth, supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service of the United States, for the fiscal year 1873, for the use of the Senate and House.

The committee recommend that the resolution be amended as follows:

After "1873" insert "fifteen hundred;" and strike out the word "House," and insert "thirty-five hundred for the use of the House."

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. This comes from the Committee on Printing, and is a privileged report.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that the resolution provides for an expenditure of money.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not hold to such ruling in regard to printing, as printing is clearly an exception, because the mode of this printing is regulated by law between the two Houses.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I wish to inquire why the committee provides for the publication of this document until the question of reviving the franking privilege is considered and acted on by the two Houses?

Mr. HALE, of New York. The publication, the printing of which is now recommended, is the report of John M. Woodworth, M. D., the supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service of the United States. The Committee on Printing is satisfied it is a highly important work, and especially in the direction of economy in laying out for the first time a plan for marine hospitals, which is said to save about 90 per cent. upon the old form of marine hospitals. The information it contains is highly valuable both to the medical profession and to all persons interested in the welfare of the marine-hospital service.

As to the specific question put by the gentleman from Vermont, the Committee on Printing did not deem it their duty to await the action of the House in regard to whether documents should be sent free or at the expense of members. When a question comes to them for decision, the committee deem it their duty to report to the House whether, in their judgment, the document ought to be published or not; and with that their duty ends. I have made the report in that view by instruction of the committee.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make no question in respect to the value of the publication. I know nothing about it. I presume the statement of the gentleman from New York is entirely warranted by the character of the publication itself. The only point I make is this: So far as I am aware of the practice in respect to the distribution of public documents by members of either House, it has been done under the franking privilege; so it has been in some sense, if not a perquisite of the member, at least a privilege, though it has frequently proved an onerous burden upon the member. If this document is to be distributed at the charge of the person who may want it, the physicians and surgeons of the country who may want it, there is no reason why members of Congress should be charged with its distribution. That can be done by the office where it is prepared. It did occur to me, and it seems to me so now, this House should refrain from ordering the publication of any document for distribution by members of the Senate or House until some action is taken in the way of a law providing for such distribution. As I understand, (if it is proper to allude to the action of the other body,) the proposition passed here several weeks since, reported by the Committee on Printing, to add to the edition of the agricultural report, has been held in the Senate, and has not been acted on by that body, because there is now no provision of law in respect to the distribution of public documents.

I am not arguing whether there should be a franking privilege or not. That question will bide its time, and when the bill comes before us if I can get an opportunity I will express my judgment on it. But so far as this action is concerned, it seems to me eminently advisable that we should wait until we ascertain what provision the law has made for such distribution. Otherwise I see no propriety whatever in charging members of Congress—I do not mean in a pecuniary sense—in charging members of Congress, or putting upon them a duty, in the distribution of public documents, or providing that a certain number of documents shall be printed, such a proportion for the House and such a proportion for the Senate; and unless the committee think that there is some special need of haste in respect to this matter, I would suggest to them that the resolution be recommitted to await the action of the House upon the other measure.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ought to have stated that this document has already been printed by the Treasury Department, and I understand the forms are now in existence.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is it stereotyped?

Mr. HALE, of New York. It is not stereotyped. They merely print from the forms, as I understand, and the result will be if action is deferred that new expense will be caused for composition. As the forms are still standing, it seems to me very desirable that whatever number of copies is needed shall now be printed. As to the question of franking, I do not believe that the members of this House are going to say that we shall send no documents home, nor have any for distribution, unless we have the franking privilege.

Mr. SPEER. Is this the Medical History of the War?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Not at all. It is a simple document.

The report of the Committee on Printing was agreed to—ayes 89, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont has raised a point in connection with this resolution which ought to be made clear—that, containing an appropriation of money, or requiring one, it ought to go to the Committee of the Whole. The Chair holds differently. He does not consider that the rule applies to resolutions touching matters to be printed, because the Committee on Printing is a joint committee, and by the Statutes at Large, volume 12, page 117, their duties are laid down, and there is an agreement between the two branches of Congress as to how they should be performed. The same privilege is given as regards each branch by a common understanding as to how the committee will report.

Moreover, the rule is that all bills making appropriations of money or property, or requiring such appropriations, shall have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole. It has always been held that any rule applying to a bill, applies also to a joint resolution, but not to a concurrent resolution; and this being a concurrent resolution, reported by the committee in pursuance of a statute at large, the Chair does not hold that the rule in regard to bills making an appropriation of money applies to it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It is a provision of the Constitution that each House may determine the rules of its own procedure. I would inquire of the Chair how a law which requires the signature of the President can regulate the procedure of either House?

The SPEAKER. The two Houses have agreed to this mode of procedure by that which is tantamount to a joint rule.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I was not aware of the existence of such a joint rule.

The SPEAKER. It has been regarded in that light and treated as such at all times.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not find any joint rule to that effect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will further observe that there is another objection to allowing the point of order to apply in this case. The right given the Printing Committee to report at any time is because of the necessity of their having a document printed very promptly. If a single objection could send their report to the Committee of the Whole on the General Calendar, it would defeat the whole end of the printing. It clearly lies outside the rule, and does not in any way come within it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I do not desire to antagonize the ruling of the Chair; but if the Chair will allow me I would call attention to the suggestion made by the Speaker, that, inasmuch as this was a report privileged at any time, to be permitted to raise the point of order would have a tendency to defeat that privilege; and I would ask the Chair if any other committee should be privileged to report at any time, would the point of order lie against any report it might make?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not make the right to report at any time a point at all. He merely mentioned that as another reason why the point of order should not apply in this case.

LAND-GRANT RAILROADS.

Mr. HOLMAN. A resolution was adopted directing the Secretary of War to inform the House what payments had been made to certain railroads which it was thought had not been entitled to receive pay for transportation of troops. The Department of War informs the House that that information can only be obtained through the Treasury. I desire that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be directed to furnish the information; and with that view I move the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House how much money has been paid since the 1st of January, 1866, for the transportation of property and troops of the United States over each of the several railroads which have been constructed in whole or in part by the aid of lands granted by the United States to any State or company for that purpose, on the condition that such railroads should be and remain "public highways for the use of the Government of the United States, free from all toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States," or upon like condition except using the term "free from all toll or other charge;" and that the said Secretary furnish such information to this House at as early a day as may be practicable.

The resolution was adopted.

NYATT POINT LIGHT-HOUSE.

Mr. HOOPER, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Commerce, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (S. No. 438) to withhold from sale the site of the old Nyatt Point light-house.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be, and they are hereby, directed to investigate the alleged violation of the eight-hour law in the work on the New York post-office, and to send for persons and papers if necessary.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DONNAN, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Printing the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House seven hundred extra copies of the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1875.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. PENDLETON, by unanimous consent, presented the following memorial; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, citizens of the State of Rhode Island, representing the various national banking institutions of the State, respectfully represent:

That the provisions of the sixth section of the act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes, approved July 12, 1870, directing in effect the withdrawal from the banking associations which were the first to organize under the act to provide a national banking currency, &c., of their circulating notes to the amount of $25,000,000, will operate, if enforced by any legislation providing for machinery to give effect to the section of the law referred to, very prejudicially to the interests of this State and of New England.

The national banking capital in the State amounts to $20,500,000, and the amount of bonds pledged for circulation is about $15,000,000.

All of the national banking associations organized promptly after the passage of the act, and at the time when it was of vital importance to the preservation of the Government that the financial system by the act inaugurated should be accepted by the country.

The very large and varied manufacturing and mechanical industries in this State, the extent of which will be best appreciated from the fact that the first collection district paid a larger internal-revenue tax on manufactures for several years into the Treasury than any other in the country, require for their successful prosecution all the banking facilities which the State now has. To contract any part of the circulation would directly diminish the volume of money resources, enhance the value of currency necessarily required for the weekly payment of thousands of operatives, and create financial disturbance, all resulting in the end in an increase of burden upon the consumer.

The undersigned believe that the attempt to equalize the distribution of currency by withdrawals from the earlier organized banking associations of a percentage of their circulation, to be given to associations in States and Territories having less than their proportion, would be attended with greater loss to the industrial communities which would suffer thereby than could possibly result from equalizing the proportions of circulation by increasing the volume of currency to the extent of twenty-five millions, for the benefit of associations in the States and Territories having less than their proportion.

The undersigned therefore pray that the sixth section of the act above referred to be repealed; and they respectfully protest against the passage of the bill just reported from the Finance Committee, to provide for carrying into effect the sixth section of said act.

PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND, February 5, 1874.

FORT STEILACOOM RESERVATION.

Mr. McFADDEN asked unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table, for the purpose of reference, the bill (S. No. 254) to donate the military reservation of Fort Steilacoom to the Territory of Washington, for the use of an insane asylum.

No objection was made; and the bill was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

REVENUE-CUTTER RELIEF.

Mr. BROMBERG, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2076) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue the use of the cutter Relief as a revenue-cutter, and to use said vessel for a boarding station in Mobile Bay; which was read three times, and passed.

EXPLOSIVE SHELL-FUSE.

Mr. BURLEIGH, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Naval Affairs the petition and accompanying papers of William Wheeler Hubbell, for settlement of his explosive shell-fuse patents, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

REFERENCE OF BILLS ON SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. ARCHER. I ask unanimous consent that the House now proceed to business on the Speaker's table, for the purpose of referring bills only.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

EPIDEMIC CHOLERA.

The first business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendments to House joint resolution No. 29, authorizing the Secretary of War to detail medical officers of the Army to inquire into and report upon the causes of epidemic cholera; which were taken up, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WILLIAM KILBURN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 437, to restore William Kilburn, of San Francisco, California, to the Navy of the United States as an ensign; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

FORT RANDALL MILITARY RESERVATION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 149, for the relief of certain settlers on the Fort Randall military reservation; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JAMES M'DONALD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 238, permitting James McDonald, a warrant officer of the Navy, to accept a silver medal from the government of Italy; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

W. W. ELLIOTT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 310, for the relief of W. W. Elliott; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

JOSEPH MONTANARI.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 311, for the relief of Joseph Montanari, and for other purposes; which was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

HENRY C. SMITH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 317) for the relief of Henry C. Smith, of Indianapolis, Indiana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ANDERSON J. SMITH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 341) for the relief of Anderson J. Smith; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

D. B. ALLEN & CO.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 439) to provide for the payment of D. B. Allen & Co. for services in carrying the United States mails; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

LIEUTENANT OLIVER V. RICHARDS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 100) for the relief of Lieutenant Oliver V. Richards; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MATTHEW WOODRUFF.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, late first sergeant Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

OLIVER POWERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 366) for the relief of Oliver Powers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

SCIOTHA BRASHEARS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 361) granting a pension to Sciotha Brashears, late of the Seventeenth Regiment Kentucky Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ELIZABETH F. THOMPSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 316) granting a pension to Elizabeth F. Thompson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

TITLES OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 269) to change the titles of certain naval officers, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

RECONSIDERATION OF REFERENCES.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the votes by which the bills, &c., had been referred or recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF INDIAN SERVICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior in answer to a resolution of the House of January 7, 1874, transmitting a detailed statement of the amount of moneys expended and indebtedness incurred in connection with the Indian service from June 30 to December 31, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

RAYMOND'S REPORT ON MINING.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of Rossiter W. Raymond on the statistics of mines and mining in the States and Territories west of the Rocky Mountains; which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and ordered to be printed.

COLUMBUS, FAYETTE AND DECATUR RAILROAD.

Mr. HERNDON, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Public Lands, a bill (H. R. No. 2077) authorizing the Columbus, Fayette and Decatur Railroad Company, of Alabama and Mississippi, to purchase public lands; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

STOCKTON AND COPPEROPOLIS RAILROAD.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, presented current resolutions of the Legislature of California, relative to lands granted to the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad Company; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ARKANSAS ELECTION CONTEST—GUNTER vs. WILSHIRE.

Mr. KILLINGER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the question is upon the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. THOMAS,] that the vote agreeing to the resolution awarding the prima facie seat for the third district of Arkansas to Mr. Wilshire be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should reconsider the vote agreeing to the resolution to admit Mr. Wilshire to a seat, and should then defeat that resolution, would the effect be to leave the matter in the hands of the Committee on Elections, to report upon the merits who is entitled to the seat from the district in question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair hardly thinks that the gentleman's inquiry, which relates to the effect of a vote, is a parliamentary question.

Mr. HALE, of New York. It seems to me to be strictly such.

Mr. GARFIELD. It might be called a parliamentary statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is always ready to answer parliamentary questions, but he does not wish to have arguments extracted from him in that form.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to ask——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for the regular order. I would inquire whether it is in order now to make an unparliamentary speech in the shape of a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I beg to modify my question. If the House should decide to reconsider this vote and should negative the resolution, I ask the Speaker where that would leave the question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see that there would be any question left. [Laughter.] There would be nothing before the House.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to put a parliamentary inquiry. As a preliminary, let me ask whether it is not proper to inquire of the Chair whether, in the event of a certain disposition of a particular motion, another motion would be in order?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; but that was not the question of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, if this vote should be reconsidered, it would then be proper to move to amend the resolution by substituting a recommitment of the case to the Committee on Elections?

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not see how, because the previous question is operating, and has been partly executed.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. That is what I wish to know.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Cannot that be reconsidered?

The SPEAKER. The previous question partly executed cannot be reconsidered.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. My inquiry is whether, if this be reconsidered and the resolution rejected, it would not then be in order to reconsider—on the motion being made by the proper person, of course—the vote by which the House refused to substitute the resolution of the minority for the resolution of the majority?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that under the previous question the vote was taken on the motion to amend.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is having the Journal examined.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The motion to amend was included. The previous question was on the original resolution and the amendment.

The amendment was voted down and the original resolution was adopted. Now if that be reconsidered, will it not be in order to reconsider the vote rejecting the amendment?

The SPEAKER. That would be in order. The latitude of parliamentary inquiry must not be abused.

Mr. MCNULTA. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. It is an abuse of the privilege of parliamentary inquiry when an advantage or disadvantage to one side or the other is attempted. The Chair desires to be perfectly impartial. If there is any enlightenment as to the effect of a rule it is the duty of the Chair to give it, but it is not the duty of the Chair to so shape decisions that advantage or disadvantage may result to one side or the other.

Mr. MCKEE. Is it not a question of the highest privilege to swear in a member? Has not the House passed a resolution that the gentleman from Arkansas, Mr. Wilshire, is entitled to a seat upon this floor? As the question of reconsideration to lay upon the table is not an essential part of legislation, is not the gentleman from Arkansas entitled now to present himself at the bar of this House and ask to be sworn in?

The SPEAKER. The Chair differs from the gentleman from Mississippi in regard to the essential part of legislation. It is essential. It is not an accomplished fact until the motion to reconsider is laid upon the table, if the motion to reconsider is made. If the motion to reconsider is not made, of course the gentleman can be sworn in; but being made, it must be disposed of.

Mr. MCKEE. But suppose the House adjourns without acting on it?

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the House to act on it. It is of the highest privilege, and the House fails to discharge its duties to the claimant of the seat if it does not act on it.

Mr. MCKEE. Is it of higher privilege than the right of this claimant to the seat, after the resolution has passed that he is entitled to it?

The SPEAKER. He has not the right to be sworn in until that is done, no more than if the first resolution had passed.

Mr. MCKEE. But suppose the gentleman withdraws the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. Of course then there is nothing pending.

Mr. MCKEE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion to reconsider.

Mr. MCCRARY. I wish to inquire whether, if the motion to reconsider shall prevail, and the pending resolution be voted down, it will be in order to recommit the contest to the Committee on Elections, with instructions as to what they shall do?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know how a resolution of that kind can be got in.

Mr. MCNULTA. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DEWITT. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The practice of allowing parliamentary inquiries has grown up of late years. Formerly they were sternly refused. A question as to the effect of a vote was always denied.

Mr. DEWITT. I think my parliamentary inquiry is a legitimate one.

The SPEAKER. If parliamentary inquiries are to branch out so as to delay the vote after the previous question has been seconded and is operating, the Chair will be compelled to return to the old usage, and absolutely to decline to hear them. The presumption is that every member of the House knows the effect of a motion as well as the Chair. If he does not, he ought to.

Mr. DEWITT. My question, I think, is a legitimate one. Do we vote on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, or do we vote on the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know how he can make it plainer than he has done. The pending motion is to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. It is a proceeding as common as the motion to adjourn.

The question was on laying on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SPEER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 129, not voting 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barrere, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cannon, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—129.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banning, Barber, Barnum, Barry, Cain, Creamer, Duell, Elliott, Freeman, Hoskins, Howe, Hubbell, Kellogg, Lansing, Lewis, Morey, Morrison, Purman, Randall, Read, Stephens, St. John, Taylor, Tremain, and Ephraim K. Wilson—25.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, said: My colleague, Mr. BANNING, is detained from the House by sickness in his family.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The House having laid on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House passed the resolution giving the prima facie seat to Mr. Wilshire, that gentleman is now entitled to be sworn in.

Mr. WILSHIRE appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the law of July 2, 1862.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-five minutes past one o'clock, and reports are in order from the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUNISHMENT OF MANSLAUGHTER.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1593) relating to the punishment of the crime of manslaughter, with an amendment.

The bill was read. It provides that whoever shall hereafter be convicted of the crime of manslaughter, in any court of the United States, in any State or Territory, including the District of Columbia, shall be imprisoned not exceeding ten years and fined not exceeding $1,000. The second section repeals all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act.

The amendment reported by the committee was to strike out the word "ten," before the word "years," and to insert "twenty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The question was on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to hear the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] explain what change this bill makes in the law.

Mr. FRYE. I will state briefly, Mr. Speaker, the effect of this bill. Under existing law there were two degrees of homicide. Murder is punishable by death; manslaughter, under existing law, by imprisonment not exceeding three years. Now, in a great number of cases there is a shadow of doubt as to whether the crime is murder or manslaughter; and, the punishment of murder being death, the jurors rightly give the benefit of that doubt to the accused; so that one-third of the cases of manslaughter come as close to murder as they possibly can and escape. And yet the discretion in the judge who has to pass sentence is only to the extent of three years. This extends that discretion, giving a latitude to the extent of twenty years.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This repeals an existing statute for the punishment of manslaughter. Is there any saving of pending prosecutions? The repeal of a criminal statute puts an end to all pending prosecutions, unless there be some general laws to save them. I believe we have no such general law. As this bill, therefore, repeals the existing law relating to manslaughter, ought there not to be a clause saving pending prosecutions?

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The bill should also except all cases pending at the passage of the law; otherwise, if we increase the penalty, it would be an ex post facto law.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I should like to hear the bill again read.

The bill as amended was again read.

Mr. FRYE. I do not understand that that repeals any law.

Mr. BASS. I ask the gentleman, would not this be an ex post facto law, so that any offense of manslaughter already committed would not be punished under it? By this law you provide a greater degree of punishment for crimes that may have been to-day committed than was provided at the time of the commission of the offense; so that the effect of this statute would be that, if an offense has been already committed, the offender not having been punished cannot be punished under this statute, because it provides for a greater punishment than the statute provided at the time of the commission of the offense.

In the State of New York we have had this precise question before the court of appeals, the Legislature of New York having, in 1862, passed an act providing for a different punishment for the offense of murder.

The consequence was that, although there were offenses of murder which had been committed but not punished at the time the new statute was enacted, all those offenders escaped punishment under the new law. The lawyers upon this floor are doubtless familiar with the case of Mary Hartung, the recent notorious case of Rosenweig, and other cases of that character, which have been before our court of appeals, and in which the offenders escaped punishment. If this bill shall be passed without providing that it shall not apply to offenses already committed and not punished, then all offenders who have not been tried will escape punishment under this act, it being in the nature of an ex post facto law.

Mr. FRYE. I do not agree with the arguments offered, but I will move the following amendment, for it will do no harm:

Provided, That this act shall not affect any prosecution now pending, or the prosecution of any offense already committed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. We passed a law some two years ago, creating the territorial Legislature of the District of Columbia, by which we undertook to depute to that Legislature all legislative authority over this District, including the right to make laws which should affect all crimes and misdemeanors, general legislative authority with certain exceptions. Now, is it the purpose of the Committee on the Judiciary to resume the whole legislative authority over this District, or is it their purpose to reserve it for certain special cases? It seems to me the Law Committee of this House should have some policy on this subject which may be announced to the House.

Mr. FRYE. I do not see any purpose to be accomplished by excepting the District of Columbia from a law which we regard as healthy for the whole country, so far as United States courts are concerned.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The point of my question is this: Congress went on the ground that in the future, with certain specified exceptions, the District of Columbia should be governed by its own Legislature, just as States are governed by theirs, having full authority to make laws on all subjects.

Mr. FRYE. Those laws are still subject to revision by us.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not raise any question of authority. I simply ask what is the policy of the Judiciary Committee of this House?

Mr. FRYE. So far as this bill is concerned it is the policy of that committee to legislate for the District of Columbia at any rate.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The committee have considered the question?

Mr. BARBER. I ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to yield to me for an amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I cannot yield for the purpose of receiving an amendment; but I will hear it read.

Mr. BARBER. I wish to move the following amendment:

And the punishment of murder shall be confinement in a State prison for life.

Mr. FRYE. I do not yield for that amendment.

Mr. BASS. An amendment has been adopted on motion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] providing that "this act shall not affect any prosecution now pending," &c. I suggest that there should be a further amendment, by inserting after the words "not affect," the words "or apply to."

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUNISHMENT OF EXTORTION.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 1594) for the punishment of extortion by officers or persons acting under the authority of the United States.

The bill provides that if any officer or person acting under the authority of the United States shall be guilty of extortion under or by color of his office or his authority aforesaid, every person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, according to the aggravation of the offense.

The first amendment to the bill was to insert the word "hereafter" before the words "guilty of extortion," so that that portion of the bill will read "shall hereafter be guilty of extortion," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out "one year," and insert "three years," so that it will read "be imprisoned not exceeding three years."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1592) limiting the time for prosecutions, trials, and convictions in certain criminal offenses.

The bill was read. It provides that no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished in any court of the United States for any State or Territory, including the District of Columbia, for any offense not capital, or for any fine or forfeiture under any penal statute, unless the indictment or information for the same shall be found or instituted within five years from the time of committing the offense, or incurring the fine or forfeiture aforesaid; provided that nothing therein contained shall extend to any person or persons fleeing from justice. The second section repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of the first section add these words:
That it shall apply to no case barred by existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OCCUPYING CLAIMANTS.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2078) for the benefit of occupying claimants; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It provides that when the occupant of land, having color of title, in good faith has made valuable improvements thereon, and is in the proper action found not to be the rightful owner thereof, such occupant shall be entitled to all the rights and remedies, and, upon instituting the proper proceedings, such relief as may be given or secured to him by the statutes of the State or Territory where the land lies, although the title of the plaintiff in the action may have emanated from the United States after said improvements were so made.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman reporting this bill will explain the reasons for its passage. I confess I do not quite understand its effect from the reading.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, this bill simply controls the United States courts in this matter of betterments. It merely provides that in cases of this kind the United States courts shall be governed by the same rules of law which prevail in the courts of the State where the land in controversy lies. It relates to cases where improvements are made under color of title and in good faith, but where the title fails.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is not that the law now?

Mr. FRYE. It is generally in the State courts, but not in the United States courts.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Are not the United States courts now governed in these cases by the law of the State in which the land lies?

Mr. FRYE. Not in all cases. This bill provides that it shall be so.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I am aware of no case where such is not the practice.

Mr. FRYE. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCRARY,] who will state a case showing the necessity for the passage of this bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Let me ask the gentleman from Iowa whether the effect of the bill is not to give a party in the Federal courts the same rights in this respect that he would have in a State court.

Mr. McCRARY. Mr. Speaker, the effect of this bill is, as suggested by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY,] to give to occupying claimants the same rights in the Federal courts that they have under the laws of the several States in the State courts. My friend from New York [Mr. HALE] inquires whether that is not their right now. I answer that it is in almost every case; and possibly it may be in all cases; but a question very important to a large number of settlers upon lands in the State of Iowa has arisen—the question whether a party can be regarded as having color of title to land when the title is finally adjudged to have been in the Government itself. This bill is designed to meet that question. It grows out of these circumstances: Several grants of land have been made to Iowa, both as a Territory and as a State, at various dates. The first was a grant for the improvement of a river in that State; the subsequent grants were made to railroad companies. These grants crossed each other; and a question arose as to the extent of the river grant. Upon that question there were conflicting decisions, not only by the Departments here but by the local authorities. At one time this river grant was held to extend to the northern boundary of the State. While that construction was placed upon it by the authorities of the United States, patents were issued to a large number of persons, many of whom have made improvements of great value. Some of them have farms on which they have resided for twenty years. The decision under which these patents were issued has been reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and these titles are all held to be invalid. The effects of this bill will be to allow these persons to claim pay for their improvements made in good faith and under color of title.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. It strikes me that the phrase "color of title," as contained in the bill, may not be the proper language to cover all the cases contemplated. I would suggest that the point would be met by a provision that where parties have in good faith made improvements they shall be allowed for them, if such is the provision of the State law in similar cases.

Mr. MCCRARY. The phrase "color of title" is pretty well understood and settled by the courts where I reside. It is used in nearly all of the statutes upon this subject, and I think it would be hardly safe to strike it out from this bill. We are content with it as it is.

Mr. FRYE. I yield now one minute to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I wish to indorse this bill by saying it is a law in the right direction. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] has referred to a case in his State. I wish to say all over the State of Kansas there are cases of this kind, where settlers have gone on the lands, paid for them, taken receipts, put up valuable and lasting improvements, and then there has come a decision of the Secretary of the Interior that they have no rights to their homesteads. Thus they have been despoiled of the roof that sheltered them. This bill, if it does not accomplish all we desire, is at least a move in the right direction, and puts it in the power of the State itself to apply the remedy. It seems to me it is one of the wisest measures which has come before this Congress during the session. In behalf of many wronged constituents, I welcome any law which promises relief.

Mr. FRYE. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LAWRENCE. There is a large number of settlers I know who are interested in this bill; but I wish to suggest to the gentleman who has it in charge whether it would not be better to amend it, so as to make it applicable to improvements heretofore made and in actions now pending. It is a general rule in the construction of statutes that they are to be deemed prospective in their operation only, unless by clear terms in the act they are to apply retroactively. This bill is so drawn, it seems to me from the reading of it, as to be retroactive; but to avoid all doubt and to remove all ground for controversy, it may be well to amend it. I know very well actions are to be tried and controlled by the law in force when they are heard, as a general rule. As a matter of abundant caution I move to add to the bill the words which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And this act shall apply to improvements heretofore made and in actions now pending.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It does now clearly. There can be no doubt about it. You might as well add the Lord's prayer.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It will do no harm. The Lord's prayer requires by its precepts that this bill be passed.

Mr. FRYE. I do not yield to the amendment, because I think the bill is ample as it is now.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I think this is a just and wise measure, so far as I can judge from hearing it read and the explanations which have been made by various gentlemen. It will secure uniformity in the administration of justice in reference to the titles to lands in various States. I hope it will pass.

Mr. FRYE. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONS CHARGED WITH CRIMES COMPETENT WITNESSES.

Mr. FRYE also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 492) to make persons charged with crimes and offenses competent witnesses, with the recommendation that it do pass, with an amendment.

The bill, which was read, provides, in the first section, that in the trial of all indictments, informations, complaints, and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes, offenses, and misdemeanors, the person so charged shall, at his own request but not otherwise, be a competent witness.

The second section provides that nothing therein contained shall be construed as compelling any such person to testify; nor shall any inference of his guilt result if he does not testify; nor shall the counsel for the prosecution comment thereon in case the respondent does not testify.

The third section provides that the provisions of the act shall apply to all prosecutions now pending.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In line 5, after the word "misdemeanors," insert these words:
In the United States courts in any State or Territory, including the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope now the bill will be reported as amended.

The bill was again read.

Mr. GOOCH. I should like to ask the gentleman who reported this bill if it covers cases of courts-martial?

Mr. FRYE. I should say it did not.

Mr. GOOCH. It seems to me that principle should be applied to courts-martial as well as elsewhere. I have now in mind a case where the court who tried it found the man guilty, but the majority certified on the back of their finding that if the party had testified the same that he stated on honor they would have found the other way. I suggest to the gentleman there can be no objection whatever to applying this principle so as to allow parties to testify in cases where they are tried by courts-martial. And I would like to suggest an amendment including that, if the gentleman from Maine sees no objection. It is a mere verbal amendment. I will write it after seeing the bill.

Mr. DEWITT. I would like to suggest an amendment forbidding the judge to comment in his charge on the fact that the respondent does not take advantage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. FRYE. I accept the amendment which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] proposes to offer.

Mr. SPEER. Does this bill relate to capital cases?

Mr. FRYE. To all criminal cases.

Mr. GOOCH. I move to amend by adding the words "courts-martial and courts of inquiry."

Mr. SPEER. The bill, of course, if passed, will apply to the trial of all offenses committed previous to its passage, including the case of General Howard. I suppose that was the case the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GOOCH] referred to.

Mr. GOOCH. I had no reference to the case of General Howard. I referred to another case now in the War Department.

Mr. SPEER. It would include all cases of that kind.

Mr. FRYE. The court in General Howard's case is not a court-martial. I doubted whether that would apply to his case, and I suggested to the gentleman from Massachusetts to use the words "courts-martial and courts of inquiry."

Mr. GOOCH's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine if the effect of this bill would not be to create two rules of evidence in the States where this was not adopted for the State courts.

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCKNER. Would it be in order to move to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. Not at present. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] still holds the floor.

Mr. DEWITT. I would like to have my amendment read. It is to insert after the word "prosecution" the words "nor the judge in his charge."

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. POTTER. O, no; that cannot be admitted.

Mr. FRYE. Let me understand the gentleman's amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "prosecution," in secton 2, the words "nor the judge in his charge;" so it will read:
That nothing herein contained shall be construed as compelling any such person to testify, nor shall any inference of his guilt result if he does not testify; nor shall the counsel for the prosecution nor the judge in his charge comment thereon in case the repondent does not testify.

Mr. FRYE. No; I cannot admit that amendment, because it prevents the judge from saying a single word in favor of the prisoner, if he chooses, in case he does not testify.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It defeats the very purpose which is intended by the provision of the bill, that the counsel shall not be allowed to comment upon it; because the judge will not be even allowed to guard the jury against considering the fact. I hope my friend will not insist on that amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I decline to admit it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is the very worst amendment that could be put upon it.

The SPEAKER. It is not pending.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman from Maine yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FRYE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Speaker, I am indebted to the courtesy of the gentleman from Maine for enabling me to say a word in opposition to this bill. The principle involved in it is one of the very highest importance in the administration of criminal justice. It has been much discussed in many of the States, and a step in the direction contemplated by this bill has been taken in my own State. There, in criminal trials, the defendant, at his election, is permitted to testify in all prosecutions for misdemeanor, but not in prosecutions for felony. This bill allows the defendant, at his election, in all criminal cases, to testify. The indictment may be for rape, for arson, for murder, for treason, the highest of all crimes known to the criminal law.

Now, what is the effect of it? Suppose the defendant is guilty, his life is at stake upon the trial. He will not, perhaps, by his perjury secure his acquittal. On the one hand the law says to him, "Perjure yourself, and you shall be acquitted; hold fast to your integrity, and you shall be hung." That is the alternative which this bill presents to every man on trial for murder or any capital offense.

If the law passes, of course jurors, who are supposed to be intelligent gentlemen, and generally are in United States courts, will know that such is the law. They will know that the defendant has a right at his election to be a witness. Suppose, then, that he declines to testify? It is true that the bill says that no reference shall be made to his declinature by the counsel in arguing the case to the jury; but jurors must know that, under the law, he has a right to be sworn, and they will naturally, nay, inevitably and irresistibly, conclude that if he is an innocent man he would open his own mouth in defense of his own life.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman show how that is an objection to the bill?

Mr. SPEER. I think that is an objection to the bill for this reason: The law presumes a man to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty. The jury should not be put in the attitude of drawing an inference, not from evidence but from the want of evidence, from the silence of the accused; of drawing an inference of his guilt, not from any evidence adduced in the trial of the case, but from the refusal of the party himself to become a witness. I trust this House will pause before it makes a change so radical, so fundamental, in the administration of criminal justice in this country.

I am requested by gentlemen to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to state how many States have adopted the principle involved in this bill? I believe his own State has.

Mr. FRYE. I think that perhaps one-half of the States in the Union have done so. I know that all the New England States have, and so have New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Kansas, and other States.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I would say that the State from which I come has adopted this principle. I have assisted in proceedings at a very considerable number of capital trials under a provision like this, and in the opinion of the courts, as well as of the community, the experiment has worked absolutely favorably. In one of the most remarkable trials that has ever occurred in our State within the last ten years, a case of secret murder, where the accused might, if he had chosen, have testified in his own behalf, he was not put upon the stand, and was acquitted.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCKNER. If a criminal should come before a court of the United States, is it not a rule of the United States courts that the same practice shall be followed as is adopted in the State courts upon that subject?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I do not know what rule the gentleman refers to.

Mr. BUCKNER. The rule of evidence. Is not that the rule of the United States courts?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. In those States where in the State courts a defendant is allowed to be a witness?

Mr. CROOKE. The United States courts have declined to adopt any such rule.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I understand that is the rule now.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to ask one question of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE.] I understand that this bill applies to all the courts of the United States. It seems to me it would be a very unjust rule to apply this principle to all the States. For instance, in the State of Illinois the defendant is not allowed to be a witness. It is proposed by this bill to apply this rule to the courts of the United States in the State of Illinois, with other States, and permit the defendant to be a witness, when in the State courts he is excluded from testifying. But a short time since the House passed a bill which I earnestly supported, in which a rule in regard to land claims was adopted, providing that the rules of the State courts shall be enforced in the United States courts, in order to have a uniform rule. I think that such a rule as this bill provides should only apply to such States as have adopted that rule in their courts.

Mr. FRYE. Then, if the State of Illinois should pass a law next winter admitting such testimony, there would be an inequality in the practice.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. You can provide in this bill so that in States adopting this rule the rule shall be in force in the United States courts in those States.

Mr. DEWITT. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. FRYE. The objections which are urged here by certain gentlemen I have heard urged again and again. This law has been in force for years in my own State. It is simply a step forward in the progress of civilization; nothing more and nothing less.

When I commenced the practice of law, a man who had a single cent of interest in a question pending before the court was not allowed to testify. To-day no interest divests him of the right to testify. That is the advance of civilization. A criminal has more interest in the case than any man in the world, if innocent, to have the truth known. But now his mouth is closed in the courts of the United States. Witness after witness may come on the stand and detail circumstance after circumstance, and the man who is charged may be the only man living who can point those circumstances to where they ought to point. But his voice is now silent.

As attorney-general of the State of Maine, I remember one case in particular, a case of a charge of arson against a poor crippled soldier up in a back county of the State. Seven witnesses came on the stand and swore to facts which seemed to render it absolutely certain that the soldier was guilty of the crime of arson, and should be punished by death. I doubted the statements of those witnesses; and when the respondent took the stand to testify, I told him to stand up like a man, to testify without fear and without favor, to state what he knew, only to tell the truth, and he should be protected, and no interposition of rules of evidence should be placed there to prevent him from telling his story. Sir, he went on and told his story; and the judge, and the attorney-general himself, concurred, and the jurors, without leaving their seats, concurred in the opinion that the whole case was nothing but a combination to hang an innocent man.

In my own practice I have known two men charged with murder to be cleared on their own testimony, and on their own testimony alone. I tell you there is no danger in this practice when truth is in the man. Our chief justice once said that truth is a cube; pile error upon it mountain high, and the cube is still there. But untruth is irregular. Attempt to hide the cube of truth with a thousand irregular untruths, and it will still be seen.

Sir, I believe this bill is right, just, and humane, and that it would be a blot upon the civilization of Congress and of the age to refuse its passage.

I call for the previous question.

Mr. SENER. Is a motion to recommit in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, unless the House should refuse to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SPEER. Pending the demand for the previous question, is not a motion to lay on the table in order?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SPEER. Then I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] has indicated his purpose to make the motion.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] allow me a moment?

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the negative vote appeared to prevail.

Mr. SENER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 933) to provide for the holding of terms of the district court of the United States for the western district of Missouri, at Springfield, in said State.

The bill was read.

It provides that the western district of the United States district court for the State of Missouri be divided into two divisions, as follows, to wit: the counties of Vernon, Cedar, Polk, Hickory, Dallas, and Laclede, together with all that part of said district lying south of said counties, shall constitute the southern division; and the remainder of said district shall constitute the northern division.

The second section provides that terms of the court for the northern division shall be held at the city of Jefferson at the same times, and be governed by the same rules and regulations now provided by law for the western district of Missouri. Terms of the court for the southern division of the district are to be held at the city of Springfield, commencing on the first Mondays of January and July of each year.

The third section provides that such number of jurors shall be summoned by the marshal of the district at every term of court for the southern division as may have been ordered at a previous term or by the district judge in vacation. In case of a deficiency of jurors, talesmen may be summoned by order of the court.

The fourth section provides that special terms of the court may be held at any time that the judge of the district court may order.

The fifth section authorizes the judge of the district court to adjourn the court for the southern division, from time to time, to suit the convenience of the litigants and to meet the necessities of the business of such terms; and the intervention of a term of court at any other place shall not preclude the power to adjourn over to a future day.

The sixth section provides that all suits that may hereafter be brought in the district court shall be brought in the court of the division where the defendant resides; but if there be more than one defendant and they reside in different divisions of the district, suit may be brought in either division.

The seventh section makes it the duty of the clerk of the district court for the western district of the State of Missouri to appoint a deputy, who shall reside at the city of Springfield, and keep an office for the transaction of the business of the court in that city, and where the records of all causes in the southern division shall be permanently kept. This deputy is to exercise all the official powers of the clerk at that place within said division, and shall, before he enters upon the discharge of his duties, take the usual oath for the performance of his duties as such deputy; and nothing herein is to be held to excuse or release the clerk from legal responsibility for the acts of the deputy performed in behalf of the clerk in the office aforesaid.

The eighth section provides that the marshal for the western district of Missouri, in person or by assistant, shall attend the court when in session at the city of Springfield, and perform the duties required by law of United States marshals.

The ninth section repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to inquire whether this bill creates a new judicial district in the State of Missouri.

Mr. FRYE. It does not. It simply provides for the holding of two courts for the present district, dividing the labors of the judge.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

After the word "Laclede," in the first section, insert the words, "Pulaski, Phelps, and Dent;" and at the end of the second section add the words, "suitable court-rooms and offices being provided, without cost to the Government."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EASTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF KENTUCKY.

Mr. FRYE. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back a bill (H. R. No. 1017) to establish the eastern judicial district of Kentucky. As this bill contains an appropriation, and is liable to a point of order, I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

CODIFICATION OF LAWS OF DAKOTA.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported adversely on the memorial of the Legislature of Dakota, relative to codifying the territorial laws; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

SALARIES.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1354) fixing the salaries of certain officers; and the same was referred to the Committee on Civil-Service Reform.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF GOD IN THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported adversely upon a petition for an amendment of the Constitution of the United States, incorporating in that instrument an acknowledgment of Almighty God and the Christian religion.

The petition was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

HOLY CROSS MISSION, DAKOTA.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1509) for the relief of the Holy Cross Mission in the Territory of Dakota; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

DWIGHT F. HAYES.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Dwight F. Hayes, praying the passage of a bill referring to the Court of Claims his claim for cotton captured by the United States Navy; and the same was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, the bill (H. R. No. 489) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be treated as an original bill.

The substitute (H. R. No. 2079) was read.

It provides in the first section that there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission of five persons, neither of whom shall be a holder of any office of profit or trust in the General or a State government. These commissioners are to be selected solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation, and shall hold office until their duties shall be accomplished, but not to exceed two years. It shall be their duty to investigate the alcoholic liquor traffic in its economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people; and also inquire and take testimony as to the practical results of license and restrictive legislation for the prevention of intemperance in the several States.

The second section provides that the said commissioners shall serve without salary; shall be authorized to employ a secretary at a reasonable compensation, not to exceed $2,000 per year, which, with the necessary expenses incidental to said investigation of both the secretary and commissioners, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon vouchers to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; but the whole amount shall not exceed $10,000, and the amount necessary is thereby appropriated. It shall be the further duty of said commissioners to report the result of their investigation, and the expenses attending the same, to the President, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I rise to a question of order: that this bill makes an appropriation, and must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont makes the point of order that this bill must have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. POLAND. The committee desire to submit a report in connection with this bill. It is not yet prepared; and they desire to submit it and have it printed before the bill comes up for action.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the report will be permitted to come in and be ordered to be printed.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed with the accompanying report.

Mr. COX. Is that a unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. POLAND. Very nearly so. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is not a unanimous report. There is a majority in favor of it, but a strong minority against it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Strong, but not numerous. [Laughter.]

DEDUCTION OF DEBTS DUE THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. POLAND also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2080) to provide for deducting any debt due the United States from any judgment recovered against the United States by such debtor; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that when any final judgment shall be recovered in any court against the United States, and the plaintiff in such judgment shall be indebted to the United States in any manner, either on his own account or as surety for any other person or persons, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to retain out of such judgment so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy such indebtedness, and if such plaintiff shall deny his liability for such indebtedness to the United States or refuse to assent to such deduction, the Secretary shall, if the same is not already in suit, immediately cause proper legal proceedings to be commenced to enforce collection of the same; and in such case the Secretary shall withhold from such judgment such sum in addition to the debt claimed to be due the United States as in his judgment will be sufficient to defray all legal costs and charges of prosecuting such suit to final judgment. And if final judgment shall be recovered by the United States in such suit, the same shall be satisfied out of the money thus withheld by the Secretary, if sufficient, and any balance remaining shall then be paid over to the party entitled thereto, with 6 per cent. interest thereon during the time it has thus been withheld.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAWES. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. DAWES. I move, then, to suspend the rules, for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take up the tax bill, which is the special order.

Mr. PACKER. Pending that motion, I ask the House to proceed to the consideration of the special order, which is House bill No. 825, to provide for the distribution of public documents printed by the authority of Congress and of seeds furnished by the Agricultural Department, for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of weekly newspapers by mail within the county where published.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman will not press his motion, and I make the request not for myself but for two members of the Committee on Ways and Means who are anxious to go home, and desire to submit some remarks on the pending bills in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PACKER. I would be glad to accommodate my friend from Massachusetts, but I cannot do so on this occasion. I yielded several days since to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that, and am obliged to the gentleman for so doing.

Mr. PACKER. Gentlemen are exceedingly anxious to have the bill from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads brought up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The special order in the House takes precedence, to the exclusion of all other business save appropriation bills.

Mr. WOODFORD. I move that the pending order be laid aside.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will interrupt the gentleman a moment to ask him whether he proposes to apply his motion to laying aside the special order in reference to the franking privilege.

Mr. WOODFORD. I do.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done. The better motion would be to move its postponement. It would still hold its precedence as the special order.

Mr. WOODFORD. Under the suggestion from the Chair, I move that the pending order, being what is popularly known as the bill for the partial restoration of the franking privilege, be postponed. Let me also give notice that if this postponement be agreed to, I shall move to lay aside all pending orders, one after the other, so as to bring the House directly to the consideration of what seems to me the one pressing question of national interest, the status of the forty-four million reserve. Let us do this promptly, so that the dead-lock which paralyzes all our business interests may be broken and the wheels of our varied industries be set in motion.

Mr. PACKER. I do not yield to the gentleman for the purpose of making that motion.

Mr. WOODFORD. I move that the present consideration of this bill be postponed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is upon the floor, and the only way he can be dispossessed of the floor is to raise a question of consideration; that is, whether the House will now proceed with the consideration of the bill for the franking privilege reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The rules give to the majority of the House the absolute control of the order of business. The bill which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has charge of is a special order for this hour, and for the same hour every day, or rather at half-past one o'clock on every day, until disposed of. But of course when that hour is reached and the bill comes up it is competent for the House to raise the question of consideration, whether it will proceed with it.

Mr. PACKER. We have postponed from day to day the consideration of this bill, and a number of gentlemen are very anxious that it shall in some manner be disposed of, affirmatively or negatively. It is a matter of very considerable importance to the people. And having given way to the Committee on Ways and Means before, we think we must now insist on going on with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WOODFORD. I simply ask the attention of the House to the fact that the question is practically this: public printing and franking on the one side, and the consideration of the finances of the country on the other.

Mr. KILLINGER. I rise to a question of order. Can this question be debated?

The SPEAKER. It cannot be debated. The question is, Will the House now consider the special order?

Mr. WOODFORD. I hope that the House will, with just regard to the depression of all our business, agricultural, and industrial interests, postpone the special order, and get at a discussion and practical settlement of the forty-four million question.

The question being put, the House agreed to proceed to the consideration of the special order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 510) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the posts of the Grand Army of the Republic at Philadelphia, and other associations, for monumental purposes.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

The House proceeded to consider the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 825) to provide for the distribution of public documents printed by the authority of Congress, and of seeds furnished by the Agricultural Department, for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of weekly newspapers by mail within the county where published, reported with amendments by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The bill was read.

It provides that, from and after the passage of the act, all public documents, books, or publications, and all printed matter procured or published and issued by authority of Congress, or of either House thereof, and all packages of seeds, cuttings, roots, and scions furnished by the Agricultural Department, under authority of law, having first been stamped as provided and directed in the second section, shall be allowed to pass in the mails of the United States, to any citizen thereof, or person residing therein, without charge.

The second section provides that the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States shall cause to be prepared, for their respective Houses, a special stamp, or stamped envelope or wrapper, of such form and design as shall be directed and approved by the Postmaster-General, to be used by the said Secretary and Clerk, or by such assistants as may be appointed by either of them, for their respective Houses, only upon such printed matter or documents, or packages of seeds, cuttings, roots, and scions as aforesaid, as the Vice-President, the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, may, by their respective written autograph signatures, indorsed upon the wrappers or envelopes thereof, direct to be so sent by mail, as is provided in the first section of the act.

The third section provides that from and after the passage of the act the following mail matter shall be allowed to pass free in the mail: First, newspapers, periodicals, and magazines, reciprocally interchanged between publishers, and not exceeding sixteen ounces in weight, to be confined to a single copy of each publication; secondly, weekly newspapers, one copy to each actual subscriber residing or receiving the same within the county where the same is published; but carriers shall not be required to distribute such papers unless postage is paid upon them at the usual rates.

It is provided in the fourth section that any person who shall knowingly, and with intent to defraud the Government of the United States, use, or cause to be used, any of the said stamps, stamped envelopes or wrappers, therein authorized to be prepared and used, for any other purpose, or in any other manner than as is authorized by the act, or who shall counterfeit the name or signature of any person therein authorized to indorse his autograph signature upon the wrappers or envelopes aforesaid, or who shall willfully utter or use any such counterfeit indorsement, with the intent to avoid the payment of postage, shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not less than three months nor more than twelve months, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

The first amendment reported by the committee was to add the following proviso to the second section:

Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, if the welfare of the service shall require, make rules and regulations delaying, in whole or in part, the transmission of documents and packages hereinbefore mentioned, for any period not exceeding thirty days from the time of delivery for mailing.

The second amendment reported by the committee was to insert the word "dollars" after the word "thousand," in the fourth section.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman in charge of the bill allow me to send up to be read a substitute for the entire bill, which I desire to move at the proper time?

Mr. PACKER. I yield to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled "An act to abolish the franking privilege," approved January 31, 1873, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and all acts and parts of acts which were repealed, annulled, or made of no effect by said act hereby repealed are hereby revived and continued in full force.

Mr. PACKER. I do not accept that amendment.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is aware that there is a bill presented by myself, which I have had printed, and which I desire to offer as a substitute. That bill presents two systems of dealing with public documents. Is he willing that I shall offer it now, or shall I offer it at a future stage?

Mr. PACKER. I prefer that he should offer it after awhile.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Is my amendment considered pending?

Mr. PACKER. Under instructions from the committee, I think I will have to decline to admit any amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order. Should not this bill be sent to the Committee of the Whole? It is for expenditure of money.

The SPEAKER. That point of order is not good, because the House agreed by a suspension of the rules to consider the bill in the House. The point would be good in itself but for that fact.

[Mr. PACKER addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. KASSON. I send to the desk an amendment, which I offer as a substitute for the pending bill. I ask that it be read.

Mr. PACKER. I desire to say a word to the gentleman. The gentleman's bill has been referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. We have considered it very fully and are giving it a respectful attention. It contemplates provision as to the future, and is entirely different from the bill now submitted to the House for its consideration. For that reason I think I cannot, as at present advised by the committee, yield for that amendment.

Mr. KASSON. If, then, I understand my friend from Pennsylvania correctly, he must intend to close the debate within a few minutes.

Mr. PACKER. Not at all.

Mr. KASSON. Because otherwise, when the gentleman has yielded the floor, somebody will have an opportunity of offering amendments to the pending bill. I do not wish to speak at present, but only wish to offer this, that it may be read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] desire to have the bill voted on without amendment?

Mr. PACKER. Yes, sir; that is what I desire in regard to voting.

The SPEAKER. In what position, then, does the gentleman propose to put his bill?

Mr. PACKER. For the present I will enter a motion to recommit. I now yield the remainder of my time to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom were referred various bills for the restoration of the franking privilege in whole or part, after thorough investigation, have reported, as a substitute for the different bills, the bill under consideration, and ask its passage by the House of Representatives. It provides, in substance, that all public documents printed by authority of Congress, including seeds, cuttings, &c., from the Agricultural Department, shall pass free through the mails, upon having a stamp, to be devised by the Postmaster-General, placed upon them, and the signature of a member of Congress written thereon, and that all newspapers in the counties in which they are published shall go free through the mails.

The bill does not provide for the correspondence of members of Congress or with them going free through the mails; on the contrary, the committee have been careful in framing this bill to provide against any matter going free, in the event it becomes a law, except such as is specially mentioned therein; and I for one am opposed to any legislation by virtue of which abuses could creep in similar to those that obtained under the former law, and I am not in favor of the restoration of the franking privilege as it formerly existed.

I desire briefly to assign a few of the many reasons why this bill should pass, and answer such objections as have been or may be urged against it. I am satisfied that the masses of the people never objected to public documents and seeds and cuttings from the Agricultural Department passing free through the mails; but, on the contrary, have been and are in favor of the same, and that it was only the abuse of the franking system by forgery of the frank, farming it out by some members, and the sending of matter through the mails free that was not entitled under the law to go, that the people objected to, and the objection to which was mistaken by Congress for an objection to the whole franking system.

The objections usually urged to sending public documents free through the mails are—

First. The alleged additional expense to the Post-Office Department, without payment of postage for additional service.

Secondly. That documents are distributed at the common expense, and cannot be evenly distributed so as to give every citizen a document or one of equal value and size.

Thirdly. That the mails on post-routes from Washington to Pittsburgh, at certain times when large quantities of documents are to be forwarded, are delayed and cumbered thereby at Harrisburgh.

Your committee, on investigation, became satisfied that there is no danger of the mails west of Pittsburgh being delayed or cumbered by the plethora of public documents; and in view of the fact that a much larger portion than formerly of the New York mails to and from the West now pass over the Erie Railroad, and the power and probable policy of the Department to make some one of the great trunk lines peculiarly mail-routes for the transmission of through mails from New York to the West, thereby getting superior speed and accommodations for the service, they are satisfied that the passage of documents free through the mails will not call for an increase of the service between Washington and Pittsburgh, or elsewhere; for while occasionally the service might be embarrassed on one or more days, if there were no regulations as to when documents should be transmitted, it is believed the power proposed to be given to the Postmaster-General by this bill to delay transmission of documents, in whole or part, for a period of thirty days after the same are ready to be sent, will obviate all danger of delay in transmission of the ordinary mails of the country.

Mr. Speaker, as to the question of additional cost to the Government of sending documents free through the mails, I have to say that, from an examination as to the different mail-routes and contracts for carrying the mails over the same, it is apparent that the additional cost of carrying documents as provided by this bill will be merely nominal. As shown by the Postmaster-General's report, the aggregate length of mail-routes on the 30th day of June, 1873, was 256,210 miles. Of this, 63,457 are by railroad, 16,762 by steamboat, and 175,991 miles by other routes. It is well known that when a contractor makes his bid to carry the mails the principal matter taken into consideration is the cost of making the trip over the route, and not the amount of mails to be carried; and on more than two-thirds of all the mail-routes in distance in the United States the amount paid by the Government for carrying the mails by contract is the same whether there is much or little mail matter to be carried; so that on over two-thirds of all the mail-routes in the country the sending of seeds, cuttings, &c., from the Agricultural Department, and agricultural reports, with other public documents, free through the mails will not cost the Government one cent.

Mr. KASSON. I do not desire, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Have I not an hour in my own right?

The SPEAKER. The Chair must recognize first a gentleman on one side of the question and then a gentleman on the other. It is not rulable to recognize two gentlemen on the same side of the question for an hour each.

Mr. KASSON. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CANNON,] so that he may now go on and conclude his remarks.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Not being accustomed to the rules of the House, I supposed that I had an hour in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was speaking in the remainder of the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. PACKER.] The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] now yields to the gentleman, and he can proceed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. For compensation to railroads for carrying the mails the law provides as follows:

The pay per mile per annum shall not exceed the following rates: On routes carrying their whole length an average weight of mails per day of two hundred pounds, $50; five hundred pounds, $75; one thousand pounds, $100; fifteen hundred pounds, $125; two thousand pounds, $150; thirty-five hundred pounds, $175; five thousand pounds, $200; and $25 additional for every additional two thousand pounds.

Under the operation of this law a great many railways do not carry on an average daily per annum, the whole length of their respective lines, two hundred pounds of mail matter, and would not with the addition of all the public documents they would be required to carry, so they cannot receive to exceed fifty dollars per mile whether they carry public documents or not. There are, however, a few great trunk lines, such as the Erie or Pennsylvania Central, that are carrying an average daily of more than five thousand pounds of mail matter the whole length of their lines, and so far as documents pass over those roads their compensation would be increased. But, Mr. Speaker, I ask members to observe that the increase would be small; for as the amount of matter carried increases under the law, in proportion the price decreases, so that the price paid these few trunk lines carrying daily over five thousand pounds of the ordinary mails of the country, for all matter in excess of that amount, is at the rate of one-twentieth of the price they and other roads receive for the first two hundred pounds they carry; and as to such matter over the first five thousand pounds they would gladly get rid of carrying the same, retaining the compensation for carrying the first five thousand pounds; so that it can be truly said as the mail service is organized the increase of cost to the Government for carrying public documents free will be merely nominal.

As a further proof that the cost of the postal service has not been materially decreased by the abolition of the franking privilege, and will not be increased, in fact, by sending documents through the mails as provided by this bill, I will briefly compare the cost of mail service in former years with that of the present and coming fiscal years, as estimated by the Postmaster-General:

The expenditures of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, were	$29,084,945 67
And the ordinary revenues for same time	22,996,741 57
Leaving a deficiency of	6,088,204 10

The estimated deficiency by the Postmaster-General for the year commencing 1st July, 1874, is $6,310,602; and for the year commencing 1st July, 1875, is $6,886,363, excluding the estimated revenue from official stamps which has to be met by an appropriation. So that, instead of a lessening of the deficiency, as the people generally have supposed, by the abolition of the franking privilege, the deficiency, as shown by the estimates, will be increased. Still, in fairness, I should state that the increase in the free-delivery system, which has been made since 3d June last, and otherwise, will probably account for the increase in estimated deficiency.

The Postmaster-General, in his letter of January 20, 1874, to the President of the Senate, estimates that the receipts of the Department for the quarter ending 30th September, 1873, since the abolition of the franking privilege, will exceed on certain items receipts of same quarter of 1872 $614,000, and impliedly points to that as the result of the abolition of the franking privilege. He does not state or estimate what the increased cost of sustaining and operating the Department is over the same quarter in 1872; and on examination of his report, it will be seen that the increase in the mail service over what it was the year before was as great as the increase in the revenues. On examination it also appears that the increase in revenues for the quarter ending 30th September, 1870, over same quarter in 1869, was, in round numbers, $500,000, and that the increase of revenue in 1869 was $2,151,000 over that of 1868; and the revenue of 1872 was, in round numbers, $2,000,000 over that of 1871, while in other years there was a smaller or very little increase. Yet during these different years the franking privilege was in full force.

An examination of the facts will convince any candid man that the estimated increase of revenues—and mind it is only estimated—for the quarter ending 30th of September, 1873, was not on account of postage paid on matter that heretofore went free, for the Postmaster-General tells us in his report, that which everybody knows, namely: "Publications of the class heretofore printed and sent out by order of Congress have been almost entirely cut off since the 1st of July last." So that the increase of revenues could not have come from payment of postage on that class of matter; and he has supplied official stamps to all the Departments, postmasters, and special agents in the country, so that the increase in revenue cannot come from those sources. Then the only source it could come from is from payment of postage on letters, &c., sent and received by members of Congress; and this bill in no way interferes with such increase of the revenues, whether it be much or little, for, as before stated, it does not give the frank to members of Congress for their correspondence or other miscellaneous matter.

Suppose, however, that it really will cost to send these public documents through the mails free as much as the postage at full rates would be if it were prepaid, still I think it would be wise to distribute them. In this Republic of ours the people are sovereign, and to govern properly they must have not only patriotism and honesty, but also intelligence and a knowledge of the principles of the Government and the manner in which the Government is administered, and therefore they have established free schools all over the country for the instruction of the people at the public expense; and the temper of our people is to make that instruction compulsory, and properly so; for each citizen practically is as much interested in the proper exercise of the right of franchise by the humblest and poorest citizen of the Republic as he is in his own proper action; and as the different executive officers of the Government, as well as persons constituting the Legislature, are only for the time being acting as the agents of the people, it is important, ay, not only important, but indispensable, if the genius of our institutions is preserved and the Government properly administered, that the people should keep track of the acts and doings of their agents. It is true that now news is given very generally to the people through the newspapers of the country; but when we consider the hurried manner in which it is prepared, as well as in which it is read, and that the papers frequently, I may say generally, contain a mere digest of the proceedings of Congress, of the transactions of the different Departments connected with the executive, and that from the very nature of things the reports, as digested and published, frequently contain errors, and are frequently warped by partisan feeling, the necessity of a correct and complete record of the proceedings of the legislative and executive branches of the Government being published in convenient form for use and preservation, and distributed to the people for their information, is at once seen.

Mr. MYERS. These documents should go also to the libraries.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir; these documents should go to the libraries in the different school districts. Let them go to the people throughout the country who will read them sitting around the fireside after the day's labor is over, and who, when they get information, will circulate it from mouth to mouth through their neighborhoods. I do not know whether the gentlemen in the cities have constituencies of that sort, but my fellow-members from the West will agree with me in saying that the farmers of the country get a great part of their information in that way and impart it in the same manner to their brother farmers.

But the amount of postage that would accrue to the General Government on these public documents, if paid in full, has been greatly magnified. The superintendent of the folding-room reports that the postage on all the documents printed by authority of the Forty-second Congress, for the full term of two years, was to each member of the House $892.57 per annum, provided it had been paid in full. I desire to call the attention of the House particularly to this matter for the purpose of comparing this expenditure with the expenses of another branch of the postal service for the year ending June 30, 1873, in fifty-two cities of the United States, as shown by the Postmaster-General's report. Mail matter was delivered free by the carriers at the houses or places of business of persons living in such cities; whereas in the smaller cities and villages and rural districts the people go to the office for their mails. The total cost of this system last year, in the fifty-two cities, as shown by the Postmaster-General's report, was $1,422,495.48; and giving such cities the benefit of every cent of local postage collected therein, to pay for this special service, which the balance of the country does not have, and which for the same year amounted to $1,112,251, there is a deficit for the payment of carriers, &c., of $310,244, which has to be paid by the people of the United States; an amount substantially equal to what all the postage would have been, at full rates, on all the public documents printed for the same year by the order of Congress.

Mr. MYERS. In this connection let me say to the gentleman that year after year there are deficiencies in the postal service amounting to $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, mostly for the West and South; and we gladly do our part in meeting those deficiencies. I agree with the gentleman's argument; but let him, as of course he desires, do justice in this matter. The free-delivery system is a blessing to the people.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am for the free-delivery system in the large cities, where it is needed; but I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the free-delivery system in fifty-two cities of the United States costs within a fraction as much as it did last year to send all the documents that were published by order of the Forty-second Congress, provided postage at full rates had been paid on the same.

The State of Illinois, which I have the honor to represent in part, with its three million people, second to no other State in the intelligence and industry of its inhabitants, had in the Forty-second Congress sixteen members. On the above showing, as to postage on public documents printed by authority of the Forty-second Congress, the proportion to each member would have been $892.57 per annum, and if paid in full would have amounted for the year ending June 30, 1873, to $14,281.12 on all documents distributed in that State. In the city of Chicago alone the cost of the free-delivery system for the same year was $108,873, and the total local postage $47,793, leaving a deficit of $61,079 to be paid by the people of the United States; or, in other words, it cost the Government last year, to deliver at the doors and offices of the people in the city of Chicago their letters and papers, four times as much as the postage in full would have been on all the public documents printed by order of the Forty-second Congress and distributed in the State of Illinois during that year. And what is true as to the cost of this free-delivery system in Chicago is substantially so as to Saint Louis, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, and almost all the other cities, except New York, Boston, and Philadelphia.

Mr. Speaker, the Government is now building in the city of Boston a post-office that will cost $4,000,000; one at New York that will cost $8,000,000; one at Philadelphia that will cost $4,000,000; one at Chicago that will cost $4,000,000. Cincinnati and Saint Louis are also being favored in this way to the extent of $6,000,000. The improvements of the streets and avenues of Washington alone since 1865 have cost the Government over $3,000,000; and the expenditures at the hands of the Government in the District of Columbia, in the same time, have been, for public improvements, over $14,000,000; and, as shown by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury of 7th January, 1874, the expenditures of the Government from June 30, 1865, to June 30, 1873, upon public works alone in the United States amount to the enormous sum of $103,000,000. And now the District of Columbia, with nearly all the principal cities, for public improvements to be made therein, by their Representatives in Congress are knocking at the door of the Treasury, crying, "More, more." I do not speak of these matters as arguments against the free-delivery system, or the proper expenditure by the Government of moneys for public buildings or public improvements; but I do speak of them to show that it is not just and fair for the people who are gathered together in our large cities, and enjoying to a greater extent than others these several benefits at the public expense, to object to the smaller towns and rural districts enjoying, in common with them, free public documents; and it is well enough once in a while to take an account of stock, post the books, and see how the balances stand.

But the objection is made by those opposed to free public documents, that every citizen cannot get a public document; therefore documents should not be supplied to some at the expense of all. This objection is met by the fact that no law operates equally upon all persons. All legislation is for the general good. As well say break up the public-school system, for the reason that some citizens have no children to send to school, or some persons have more property than others to contribute to the expense of keeping them up; or discontinue the carrying of the mails at the expense of the Government because some men write or receive more letters than others, or because it costs more to carry a letter or paper a thousand miles than it does to carry the same a hundred miles, yet the postage is the same in each instance; or that the Post-Office Department should be discontinued because it does not pay expenses, or that the free-delivery system in cities should be discontinued because all persons cannot be supplied with their mail matter free at their homes.

The truth is, the people get valuable information concerning the administration of the Government in all its departments and branches from these documents; and my observation is, that information obtained therefrom passes orally from man to man; and while I am proud of our great cities, and many of the citizens who reside therein, noted for their proficiency in their respective callings, and their great energy and industry in accomplishing that which they undertake, yet in the country, among the producers, the men who earn bread by the sweat of their faces, you find equally as great industry, and I dare say more general intelligence and patriotism; and this class of men especially are anxious to receive public documents and read them.

A MEMBER. The gentleman from Illinois must have oats in his pocket.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman. Yes, I have oats in my pocket and hay-seed in my hair, [great laughter;] and the western people generally are affected in the same way; and we expect that the seed, being good, will yield a good crop, I trust tenfold; and the sooner legislation is had, not only as proposed by this bill, but in all other respects as the people desire and equity and justice shall dictate, the better it will be in the long run for all people in this country, whatever may be their calling or wherever they may reside.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us inquire for a moment who are opposing the provisions of this bill, and their reasons therefor.

Well, we are told the Postmaster-General opposes this legislation. I certainly have no war to make upon the Postmaster-General. He is a courteous gentleman and an excellent officer. But let us see if his objections are well founded. He says in his letter of January 20, 1874, to the President of the Senate:

> In my last report I recommended a reduction of postage on books to one cent for ten ounces, which is the lowest rate now allowed by law for any kind of matter. If that suggestion should be adopted I cannot see why postage should not be paid upon congressional documents, as well as upon departmental matter, by an appropriation from the Treasury.

Behold, there it is, [laughter;] no objection to it, provided Congress shall make the appropriation, [laughter;] "cannot see why Congress should not make an appropriation from the Treasury to pay postage upon congressional documents."

A MEMBER. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The date is the 20th day of last January. It is a letter written by the Postmaster-General, and addressed to the President of the Senate, concerning the restoration of the franking privilege. Well, now, let's see how that will hold water. [Laughter and rappings to order.]

A careful reading of the Postmaster-General's report and above letter, and all his statements, so far as I am informed, concerning the same, show that he does not object to the passage of documents through the mails, provided Congress will make an appropriation to buy the stamps to pay postage on the same. Suppose Congress does make an appropriation, as the Postmaster-General desires, to pay postage on these documents, what does that amount to? Merely to this, that the United States goes to the expense of printing stamps and handling the same; that the United States may buy of the United States these stamps to put on documents, thereby to send them free through the mails of the United States; to what end? That the Post-Office Department may be self-sustaining, we are told; and, strange as it may appear, the Postmaster-General in his last report, in making estimates of the revenues of the Department for the present fiscal year, estimates the income from appropriations to pay for stamps to enable the other Departments of the Government to use the mails in the business of the Government, at $2,225,000.

Does it make any difference to the Government, which has to pay the $2,225,000 in any event, whether you call it a deficiency of one Department or the other? Yet it has been claimed on this floor that the $2,225,000 was an increase of the revenues of the post-offices in consequence of the abolition of the franking privilege. As well might a man spend his time in taking money from his right pocket and putting it in his left, and point to the increase of his left pocket as an evidence of his increasing wealth or revenues. The purchase of stamps by the Government of the Government to prepay postage on public documents has no advantages over the plan proposed by this bill, unless it be to enable the Postmaster-General to show a mere paper profit. On the contrary, such a plan is liable to great abuse, for under such appropriation the stamps when purchased may be used upon other documents or matter than those intended by law to go free, just as the franks of members of Congress were formerly abused.

Indeed, under the present system I am informed that the Postmaster-General is furnishing to nearly forty thousand persons, postmasters and those connected with the different Departments, official stamps, and it is becoming notorious that they are frequently used upon private correspondence. All objections of that kind are remedied by the provisions of this bill. There cannot be an abuse of the system under its provisions, for persons having the peculiar stamps in charge cannot send documents without the frank of members, nor can members send them without they are stamped with this peculiar stamp. Nor will the frank and stamp combined pass documents through the mails unless they are placed upon documents printed by authority of Congress.

The mail contractors, railroads, and express companies oppose the passage of this bill, for, as before shown, as the mail service is organized, the increase of pay to contractors carrying the mails, other than railways, for carrying these documents will not be one cent, and to the railways will be merely nominal; therefore they would like to be exempt from such service. The express companies oppose the bill for a different reason, namely: If individuals receiving these documents have to pay out of their pockets for transporting the same, the charges by express will be less than full postage; and so while the Government saves nothing, the people, who in their aggregate capacity have paid for their service as before shown, as individuals would pay a second time for the service to the express companies; and nearly all the documents now being sent are sent by express and not through the mails.

And last, but not least, we are told that the city press of the country oppose this bill, or any other measure that will give the people free public documents, for the reason, as alleged, that the individuals or incorporated companies conducting the same are desirous of monopolizing the means of information touching the affairs of the Government, at least to the exclusion of information to be furnished by the Government at the general expense. And it is also claimed by some that members cannot afford to advocate and vote for this bill, for the reason that the city press will declare war upon them and continue the same until they lose standing with their constituency. I do not believe that the city press will, as a unit, oppose this bill. A portion of it may from selfish motives, in some instances, and honestly in others. I certainly have no desire to call upon myself the assaults of the city press, or any portion of it. Nor do I fear it as long as I truly represent my constituents and act, in my representative capacity, for the interest of the people generally. Nor would I change the power of the press to assail my acts or those of any one else. On the contrary, every member of Congress, or other agent of the people, should court a fair criticism of his acts, and if he vitally misrepresents the people they should, and no doubt would, fail to continue him in places of trust. But no man is a proper person to represent the people unless he has the honesty and the backbone to stand and do what is right and for the interest of the people, without reference to what any one may say of him, or what the action of the press may be in the premises.

However, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that it will come with a bad grace from the city press to oppose this legislation or to condemn it, for the Post-Office Department is organized to accommodate the people and to assist in disseminating knowledge, even if it does not pay expenses; and this is peculiarly so with regard to the sending of city newspapers and periodicals that circulate generally throughout the country, for under the law the large city newspaper goes a thousand miles or farther, anywhere in the United States, for the same postage that the small country paper requires which is transmitted twenty-five miles. It also appears with reasonable certainty that the carriage of letters through the mails is a source of great profit to the Department, and that the carriage of newspapers and periodicals, so far as postage on the same is compared with letters, is a source of great loss to the Government.

I had a conversation this morning with the assistant postmaster of New York City. I asked him what proportion of the entire mail matter that passed through that office was composed of periodicals and newspapers, and what proportion were letters. He said there was about one-half of 1 per cent. that consisted of miscellaneous matter, and that over 90 per cent. of all matter was newspapers and periodicals.

And I hold in my hand a communication from the Third Assistant-Postmaster-General, written in reply to a note I dropped to him about another matter. I propose, after a bit, to send that communication to the Clerk's desk to be read as a portion of my remarks. It contains a statement of facts, from which it appears, with reasonable certainty, that over five-sixths of all the matter that is carried in the mails on which postage is paid is made up of newspapers and periodicals, and a very large majority of those newspapers and periodicals are published in the great cities of the country. And while I am talking about that, I want to call your attention further to the fact that the report of the Postmaster-General shows that the revenues of the Post-Office Department for last year were, in round numbers, $23,000,000, and that the expenses of the Department during that time were, in round numbers, $29,000,000. It also shows that, in round numbers, the sum of $1,000,000 was all the postage that was collected from newspapers and periodicals, constituting, as they do, five-sixths of all the mail matter carried in the country. In other words, five-sixths of the mail matter of the country yielded one-twenty-third of the revenues, and paid one-twenty-ninth of the expenses of the Post-Office Department. Or to put it in another form, it cost the United States Government last year at least $20,000,000 to provide transportation and mail facilities for the newspapers and periodicals of the country more than was received as postage on the same.

But it may be asked, how can you justify such a state of things? I answer that this state of things is not for the benefit of the papers; for while the proprietors of these publications may be, and no doubt are, benefited by having the papers which they publish and sell to the people sent through the mails substantially without charge, still it is for the benefit of the Government, and is justifiable as a powerful means of disseminating knowledge to a majority of the individuals composing the Republic, in consequence of which they are more competent to conduct the affairs of the Republic; and for the same reason the distribution of public documents is demanded and justified. And before leaving this branch of the subject I desire to say that I believe the day is not far distant when the circulation of newspapers and periodicals through the mails all over the country to subscribers therefor will be free in name, they now being substantially free in fact; and I believe the advantages resulting therefrom, by the increased dissemination of useful knowledge to the people, would tenfold repay the cost of such service. In the mean time let us hope that in view of the premises, the press of the country will not seek to oppose legislation that allows the people to have that for which they pay whether they get it or not.

And, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the people, now of all other times, when they are so justly sensitive to the encroachments of monopolies, will or should indorse our course if we, in the interest of express companies who desire no make charges for the transportation of public documents, and of a few mammoth news corporations who would gladly monopolize all means of information, refuse to pass this bill or some other embodying substantially its provisions.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say the Post-Office Department comes more nearly to the people than any other. Hand in hand with the common school, it is efficient in carrying light and knowledge to the door of the humblest as well as the most powerful citizen, a product and at the same time one of the principal preservers of our civilization.

We have already appropriated this session $4,000,000 for the Navy, and a bill is now pending to appropriate $17,000,000 more, and the gentleman from Maine who has charge of it exults over the small amount asked as an instance of great economy. The committee having charge of the Army appropriation bill are asking for $28,000,000, claiming that to be a great reduction from the usual amount. I have no fault to find with these appropriations; they are necessary to the well-being of the Republic; at the same time they are appropriations made to assist in enforcing our demands, in defending our rights by mere force, and bear fruit only while being expended.

Then let it not be said that the Forty-third Congress, when called upon to provide for the free transmission of public documents at a cost merely nominal, thereby aiding to bring knowledge to the masses of the people, which in the end, with the aid of Christian charity, will do away with all necessity for appropriations to either armies or navies, failed to do its duty.

I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read the communication from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General of which I have spoken. Not being familiar with the rules of the House, I am not certain whether it is necessary to have the whole of it read in order that it may be incorporated in my remarks. It is a document of considerable length, but it is valuable and interesting.

The SPEAKER. It can be printed with the gentleman's remarks, if no objection be made.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will not ask to have it read, then, but will ask leave to print it.

No objection was made.

The letter was as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, February 9, 1874.

SIR: The Postmaster-General has directed me to reply to your letter of the 28th January, in which you inform him that such portions of his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, as relate to the prepayment of postage on newspapers and other matter of the second class, have been referred to a sub-committee of the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, of which sub-committee you are chairman, and request him to furnish you with approximate estimates of the amount of that kind of matter that passes through the mails as compared with other matter, and the amount of revenue that should accrue therefrom, with such other information as may be in his possession or can be arrived at by the Department. I therefore beg leave to call your attention to the following statement, which, it is thought, covers the whole ground of your inquiry and sets forth in as clear manner as possible the necessity for remodeling the system of collecting postage on mail matter of the second class.

Official statistics, formulated for the Compendium of the Ninth Census, (page 508,) show that there were published in the United States and Territories, in the year 1870, 5,871 newspapers and periodicals. The following table shows their classification, circulation, and number of copies annually issued:

Periods of issue.	No.	Circulation.	Copies annually issued.
Daily	574	2,601,547	806,479,570
Tri-weekly	107	155,105	24,196,380
Semi-weekly	115	247,197	25,708,488
Weekly	4,295	10,594,643	550,921,436
Semi-monthly	96	1,349,820	33,395,680
Monthly	622	5,650,843	67,810,116
Bi-monthly	13	31,650	189,900
Quarterly	49	211,670	846,680
Total	5,871	20,842,275	1,508,548,250

Careful and thorough investigation, based on inquiries made of publishers, newsdealers, and postmasters and other officials of the Department, seems to establish the fact that at least 10 per cent. of the daily circulation and 60 per cent. of all other circulation of newspapers and periodicals pass through the mails.

Assuming that such is the case, and that the statistics published in the census report are correct, there is obtained, as an estimate of the revenue which the Post-Office Department should have received from this class of matter during the fiscal year 1869–'70, the following result:

Class.	Circulation.	Percentage passing through the mails.	Number on which postage is estimated as collectible.	Rate of postage per annum.	Amount postage estimated as due Post-Office Department.
Tri-weekly	155,105	.60	93,063	60	55,837 80
Semi-weekly	247,197	.60	148,318	40	59,327 20
Weekly	10,594,643	.60	6,356,785	20	1,271,357 00
Semi-monthly	1,349,820	.60	808,892	24	194,134 08
Monthly	5,650,843	.60	3,390,505	12	406,860 60
Bi-monthly* / Quarterly*	243,320	.60	145,992	04	5,839 68

* Grouped together because there is no rate of postage for bi-monthly issues.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, there were received from "newspaper postage," $835,727.99, which, as compared with the revenue estimated as properly collectible from that source during the year, shows a loss to the Government amounting to $1,469,813.17, or one and three-quarter times as much as was collected.

The tables of the last census (pages 510–513 Compendium) also show that during the decade extending from 1850 to 1860 the circulation of newspapers, &c., increased 166 per cent., and during the ten years ending 1870, 45 per cent. Taking, for the purpose of these estimates, only the last decennial increase, applying it to the three years which have elapsed since 1870, gives an increase of 13½ per cent. for that period, and shows the Department entitled to have received from newspaper-postage during the last fiscal year (1872–'73) the sum of $2,616,789.21, instead of which it only collected $1,072,998.19, the estimated loss footing up $1,543,791.02, or one and a half times as much as was collected.

Regarding the branch of your inquiry which asks for "approximate estimates of that kind of matter (newspaper, &c.,) that passes through the mails, as compared with other matter," I have to say that it is impossible to furnish you with specific data on this point. On the books of the Auditor of the Treasury for this Department the post-office revenues are classified under the heads of "letter postage," "newspaper postage," "waste paper and twine," "stamps sold," and "emoluments." By referring to the report of the Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, (page 164,) you will perceive that the gross revenue derived from letter postage—i. e., postage on short-paid letters, collected at offices of delivery—amounted during that year to $413,751.70, and that the sales of stamps for the same period footed up $16,581,050.44—in all for both items, $16,994,802.14. Deducting from this amount a sum sufficient to cover that received for stamps used in prepayment of postage on transient newspapers, books, and miscellaneous matter of the third class, say $2,000,000, there is left $14,994,802.14 as the revenue from postage on letters. This sum, at the rate of three cents per half-ounce, represents 15,619,585 pounds of matter.

The number of copies of daily newspapers issued during 1870 was, according to the table herein inserted, 806,479,570, and the number of all other publications 702,068,680. The assumed basis of 10 per cent. of daily, and 60 per cent. of all other issues as passing through the mails gives 501,889,165 newspapers, &c., transmitted to regular subscribers in the mails during that year. These, weighing on an average one and a half ounces, each, represent 47,052,109 pounds.

Allowing, in order to give the greatest bulk possible to sealed matter, that each three cents of the $14,994,802.14 of revenue estimated as derived from letter postage represents a letter, there appear to have been transmitted, during the fiscal year 1869–'70, 499,826,738 letters, which, at the rate of 70 cubic inches for each 100 letters,* occupied 202,505 cubic feet of space, and would have completely filled more than 140 freight cars, each 30 feet long, 8 feet wide, and 6 feet high. The 501,889,165 newspapers, at the rate of 1,400 cubic inches for each 100 papers,* &c., occupied 4,066,231 cubic feet of space, and would have packed 2,824 cars.

It will thus be seen that during that fiscal year it is estimated that 499,826,738 letters, weighing 15,619,585 pounds, and filling over one hundred and forty cars, were estimated as passing through the mails; for which the Post-Office Department is supposed to have received $14,994,802.14, while 501,889,165 papers and periodicals transmitted through the mails to regular subscribers, weighing 47,052,109 pounds, and filling 2,824 cars, yielded a revenue of only $835,727.99.

In connection herewith it is proper, if possible, to refer to the records of foreign countries, especially Great Britain, in order to obtain a criterion by which to judge of our relative position as regards the number of publications and their annual issues, as well as the collection of postage on such proportion as is distributed to subscribers through the mails.

Although there are no official data by which exact results can be obtained, Hudson, in his History of Journalism, (page 774,) estimates that in 1870 there were published in Great Britain 1,456 newspapers and periodicals, whose total issues amounted to 350,000,000 copies. During the year 1871 there passed through the mails of the United Kingdom, according to the report of the British postmaster-general, 99,000,000 newspapers, from which the government received as postage $990,000, (in our specie currency,) the rate on each paper being a half-penny. This is exclusive of the amount derived from packages containing two or more papers, which are transmitted at book-postage rates.

If we take this return and compare it with our record for 1869–'70, the result will apparently be as follows: Great Britain, with 1,456 newspapers, issued 350,000,000 copies, of which 99,000,000 passed through the mails as newspapers, at the rate of a half-penny each, yielding a revenue of $990,000. The United States, with 5,870 papers and periodicals, issued 1,508,548,250 copies, of which 501,889,165 are estimated to have passed through the mails, and, despite the fact that nearly half a cent was properly collectible on each, only received for the whole a revenue of $835,727.99. Or, to place it in another shape, the United States, with four times the number of publications, with four times the annual issues, and with over five times the number estimated as passing through the mails, collected less postage on all the papers, &c., transmitted, than Great Britain did on only the single newspaper mail circulation of that country.

Of course, at the same rate of postage as is charged in this country, Great Britain would have collected only $454,410; but this sum multiplied five and seven hundredths times (the difference in the estimated mail circulation of papers, &c., in the two countries) will show roughly what should have been collected here. Could an approximate estimate be made of the number of newspapers daily transmitted through the British mails in packages, weighing from four ounces to fourteen pounds, the discrepancy would be still more marked, and the arguments against our present system of collecting newspaper postage made still more forcible.

I am sir, very respectfully,

EDWARD W. BARBER,
Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. G. CANNON,
Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives.

Mr. KASSON resumed the floor.

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will yield, I will move that the House take a recess.

Mr. KASSON. I yield for that purpose.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 482) to authorize the cancellation of an export bond for a portion of the distilled spirits of John S. Miller on board of bonded cars of the United States;

An act (H. R. No. 1041) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana; and

An act (H. R. No. 1940) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by James McDonnell, a warrant officer in the United States Navy, of a present from the King of Italy.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WOOD for a recess, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873."

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, in the division of this work among the members of the Committee on Revision of the Laws, that portion of it relating to duties upon imports was assigned to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DUELL.] After the committee was fairly at work upon the revision, the Departments charged with the administration of this portion of the law became for the first time interested; and, aware of the importance of having this revision thorough and correct, they desired to furnish such information as they could, which we were very glad to receive. But it was quite a late period before we were able to avail ourselves of any of their aid. In the mean time the gentleman from New York who had charge of this portion of the work has been called away; and it has fallen upon me to examine it as a sub-committee. The time I have had has been very short, though I believe I have been tolerably diligent, and except for some aid I have had, especially from one of the appraisers-general, Mr. Blodgett—whose aid in this respect I desire publicly to acknowledge as of value—I should not have made much progress. But I have been able to bring a considerable portion of the work before the committee, and have their sanction for what I shall present to-night.

The first amendment that I propose is the transfer of section 2494—a general provision in relation to all articles that are not enumerated. The committee decided that this section, instead of being at the head of the list, should be at the end. They therefore propose to amend by striking out the section on page 581, and inserting it at the end of the chapter, on page 628, following section 2511.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 2494. There shall be levied, collected, and paid on the importation of all raw or unmanufactured articles not herein enumerated or provided for a duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem; and on all articles manufactured in whole or in part, not herein enumerated or provided for, a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no objection the amendment indicated will be made.

Mr. POLAND. The next amendment I propose to offer is to section 2499.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2499. The equipments, or any part thereof, including boats, purchased for, or the expenses of repairs made in a foreign country upon, a vessel enrolled and licensed under the laws of the United States to engage in the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States, or a vessel intended to be employed in such trade, shall, on the first arrival of such vessel in any port of the United States, be liable to entry and the payment of an ad valorem duty of 50 per cent. on the cost thereof in such foreign country; and if the owner or owners or master of such vessel shall willfully and knowingly neglect or fail to report, make entry, and pay duties as herein required, such vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be seized and forfeited. But the owner or master of a vessel enrolled and licensed, or intended to be enrolled and licensed, to engage in the foreign and coasting trade on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, shall furnish good and sufficient evidence that such vessel, while in the regular course of her voyage, was compelled, by stress of weather or other casualty, to put into a foreign port and purchase equipments, or make repairs, to secure the safety of the vessel to enable her to reach her port of destination, then it shall be competent for the Secretary of the Treasury to remit or refund duties thereon, and such vessel shall not be liable to forfeiture.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by inserting after the word "but," at the beginning of the second sentence of the section, the word "if;" so as to read, "But if the owner or master," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I wish to offer a further amendment to the same section, which, I will state, is taken from a statute found in the fourteenth volume of the Statutes at Large, page 184. I move to amend by adding what is in fact the residue of the section, which has been omitted from this revision. The additional clause is as follows:

And no license, or enrollment and license, or renewal of either, shall hereafter be issued to any such vessel until the collector to whom application is made for the same shall be satisfied from the oath of the owner or master that all such equipments and repairs made within the year immediately preceding such application have been duly accounted for under the provisions of this section, and the duties accruing thereon duly paid; and if such owner or master shall refuse to take such oath, or take it falsely, the vessel shall be seized and forfeited.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. On page 583, under schedule A, the commissioners have embraced the provisions in relation to the duties upon cotton goods, being all taken from the tariff law, found in volume 13 of the Statutes at Large; but they have changed the order somewhat. I am not able to see why the provisions as prepared by them are not a substantial and a correct revision of the existing laws. But there is very great jealousy in relation to any change of phraseology in any part of the tariff; and the committee have therefore decided to recommend the striking out from line 40 to line 95, inclusive, and the insertion of the statute literally. I send the amendment to the Clerk.

On all manufactures of cotton (except jeans, denims, drillings, bed-tickings, ginghams, plaids, cottonades, pantaloon stuff, and goods of like description) not bleached, colored, stained, painted, or printed, and not exceeding one hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, and exceeding in weight five ounces per square yard, five cents per square yard; if bleached, five cents and a half per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, five cents and a half per square yard; and in addition thereto ten per cent. ad valorem.

On finer and lighter goods of like description, not exceeding two hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, unbleached, five cents per square yard; if bleached, five and a half cents per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, five and a half cents per square yard, and in addition thereto, 20 per cent. ad valorem. On goods of like description exceeding two hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, unbleached, five cents per square yard; if bleached five and a half cents per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, five and a half cents per square yard; in addition thereto 20 per cent. ad valorem. On cotton jeans, denims, drillings, bed-tickings, ginghams, plaids, cottonades, pantaloon stuffs, and goods of like description, or for similar use, if unbleached, and not exceeding one hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, and exceeding five ounces to the square yard, six cents per square yard; if bleached, six cents and a half per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, six cents and a half per square yard, and in addition thereto 10 per cent. ad valorem. On finer or lighter goods of like description, not exceeding two hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, if unbleached, six cents per square yard; if bleached, six and a half cents per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, six and a half cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 15 per cent. ad valorem. On goods of lighter description, exceeding two hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, if unbleached, seven cents per square yard; if bleached, seven and a half cents per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, seven and a half cents per square yard, and in addition thereto 15 per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That upon all plain woven cotton goods, not included in the foregoing schedule, unbleached valued at over sixteen cents per square yard, bleached valued at over twenty cents per square yard, colored valued at over twenty-five cents per square yard, and cotton jeans, denims, and drillings, unbleached, valued at over twenty cents per square yard, and all other cotton goods of every description, the value of which shall exceed twenty-five cents per square yard, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem: And provided further, That no cotton goods having more than two hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, shall be admitted to a less rate of duty than is provided for goods which are of that number of threads.

That is exactly the language of the statute, punctuation and all.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 584, after line 111, to insert as follows:

Cotton cords, gimps, and galoons, and cotton lace colored, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

These are now in the tariff law of 1862, but in revising it these articles were omitted by name. They would probably be included in the general words which are used, but the committee deemed it advisable, inasmuch as they went on to enumerate all of the articles, these also should be enumerated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 584, line 118, to strike out as follows:

Thread lace and insertings, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The duty is not changed, but left the same. The revisers seemed to think, however, it should not be put here, because those who profess to know say "thread lace and insertings" instead of being cotton are linen. They are therefore transferred to the schedule of linens.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. On page 585, line 138, I move to strike out these words:

On white chalk and cliff stone, ten dollars per ton.

They are on the free list.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. In line 145, on page 585, the committee recommend that "mold" should be spelled with a "u;" so it will read:

All plain and mould and press glass not cut, engraved, or painted, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 586, after the line 191, to insert as follows:

Glass bottles or jars filled with articles not otherwise provided for, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 586, at the end of line 192, insert the following: "Glass pebbles for spectacles, not rough;" so it will read:

Porcelain and Bohemian glass, glass crystals for watches, glass pebbles for spectacles, not rough; paintings on glass or glasses, and all manufactures of glass, or of which glass shall be a component material, not otherwise provided for, and all glass bottles or jars filled with sweetmeats or preserves, not otherwise provided for, 40 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 586, in line 204, after the words "sisal grass," insert "and other vegetable substances not enumerated, used for cordage;" so it will read:

Jute, sunn, sisal grass, and other vegetable substances not enumerated, used for cordage, fifteen dollars per ton.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 586 strike out lines 205 to 209, inclusive, as follows:

Brown or bleached linens, brown hollands, blay linens, coatings, damasks, and drills, or other manufactures of flax, jute, or hemp, being of the value of thirty cents and under, per square yard, 30 per cent. ad valorem; valued above thirty cents per square yard, 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 587, line 210, strike out the word "cotton," and insert in lieu thereof the word "cot;" so it will read:

Brown and bleached linens, ducks, canvas, paddings, cot bottoms, diapers, crash, huckabacks, handkerchiefs, lawns, or other manufactures of flax, jute, or hemp, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 587, after line 230, insert as follows:

Cotton cloth, not bagging, valued at ten cents or less per square yard, three cents per pound; valued at over ten cents per square yard, four cents per pound.

And strike out lines 252, 253, and 254, as follows:

Gunny cloth, valued at ten cents or less per square yard, three cents per pound; over ten cents per square yard, four cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. My next amendment has reference to the paragraph from lines 231 to 234, inclusive.

The paragraph was as follows:

Bags, cotton bags, and bagging, and all other like manufactures, not herein otherwise provided for, (except bagging for cotton,) composed wholly or in part of flax, hemp, jute, gunny cloth, gunny bags, or other material, 40 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by inserting that paragraph after line 240 on the same page.

The purpose of these various provisions in reference to gunny cloth and bagging of all sorts is that the committee thought it advisable to state them in the order of their enactment. These amendments are for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 589 strike out line 304 and part of line 305, as follows:

All spirituous liquors not otherwise enumerated, 100 per cent. ad valorem.

All liquors not specifically provided for pay two dollars per gallon. We therefore strike out the clause just read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. My next amendment is to the paragraph on page 590, from line 345 to line 353, inclusive.

The paragraph was as follows:

Iron wire, bright, coppered, or tinned, drawn and finished, not more than one-fourth of an inch in diameter, not less than No. 16 wire gauge, two dollars per one hundred pounds, and in addition thereto 15 per centum ad valorem; over No. 16, and not over No. 25 wire gauge, three dollars and fifty cents per one hundred pounds, and in addition thereto 15 per cent. ad valorem. But wire covered with cotton, silk, or other material shall pay five cents per pound in addition to the foregoing rates.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

In line 351, after the words "15 per cent. ad valorem," insert the following:
Over or finer than No. 25 wire gauge, four dollars per hundred pounds, and in addition thereto 15 per cent. ad valorem.

I would state, Mr. Speaker, that that provision is found in the tariff act of 1861, except that the specific duty was two dollars per hundred pounds instead of four dollars. It was afterward, by a subsequent statute, raised to four dollars per hundred pounds. The revisers, having gone over the tariff acts since that time, left this provision out, finding it was not contained in the several tariff acts passed since 1861. The provision, however, is still in full force, and the language of the amendment is copied from the act of 1861.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Vermont examine line 289? Is not the word "on" there intended for "all?" As it stands at present the sentence reads thus:

Brandy and on other spirits manufactured or distilled from grain or other materials, and not otherwise provided for, two dollars per proof gallon.

Mr. POLAND. I think it would be very well to insert a comma after the word "brandy;" but brandy does not profess, I believe, to be distilled from grain. We considered that subject in committee, and were satisfied that the language was right as it stood.

Mr. ELDREDGE. What kind of brandy is it you are speaking of?

Mr. POLAND. It is not explained in the book, and I have no further knowledge on that subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. If it is the brandy of commerce, I would like to have the gentleman tell us what it is made of.

Mr. POLAND. My next amendment comes in after the paragraph commencing on line 417, which is as follows:

Anvils and iron cables, or cable chains, or parts thereof, two cents and a half per pound.

I move to amend by adding to the paragraph the following:

Provided, That no chains made of wire or rods of a diameter less than one-half of one inch shall be considered a chain cable.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. My next amendment comes in after the paragraph on page 592, commencing in line 477, as follows:

Steel, in any form, not otherwise provided for, 30 per cent. ad valorem.

I move to amend by adding to the paragraph the following:

Provided, That no allowance or reduction of duties for partial loss or damage shall be hereafter made in consequence of rust of iron or steel, or upon the manufactures of iron or steel, except on polished Russian sheet-iron.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. After the word "iron," in line 497, insert the words "and tin," so that it will read "iron and tin plates galvanized or coated with any metal by electric batteries, two cents per pound." That is the counterpart of the preceding paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. In line 520, before the words "German silver," insert the words "argentine, albata, or," so that it will read "argentine, albata, or German silver, manufactured," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out line 530, "metals, manufactures of," as unmeaning.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. In the paragraph including lines 531 to 535, put in brackets these words, "except gold, silver, platina, copper, and steel."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. After line 564 insert "on paddy one and a half cents per pound." That is rice prepared in a particular way, and we thought it better to have it come in here after rice, and take it out of the miscellaneous schedule.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. In line 601, commencing "tank-bottom sirup of sugar-cane juice," it should be "tank-bottoms, sirup," &c.

Mr. ELDREDGE. What kind of sirup is that?

Mr. POLAND. I do not know.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is a very good answer.

Mr. POLAND. We are only to find out what is the law; we are not to judge of its quality.

Mr. ELDREDGE. A very sensible man.

Mr. POLAND. "Tank-bottoms" is not a kind of sirup; it is an article by itself.

Mr. ELDREDGE. How does the gentleman know that? He could not tell what kind of sirup this was, and now he undertakes to put a comma in there, without knowing what that means, I suppose.

Mr. POLAND. I can read from the statutes.

Mr. ELDREDGE. What business has the gentleman to insert a comma there?

Mr. POLAND. We are trying to make this conform to the statutes. We can compare it without knowing much about sirups.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I only wanted to know what this "tank-bottom" is.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. After line 663 insert the following:

Timber, hewn or sawed, timber used in building wharves, and spars, 20 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I now move to strike out lines 680 and 681, which read "timber used in building wharves, 20 per cent. ad valorem." That is included in the amendment just adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. After line 679 insert—

Staves for pipes, hogsheads, and other casks, 10 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by inserting before line 723, and as the first part of the paragraph commencing with line 723, the following:

The duty upon wool of the first class, which shall be imported washed, shall be twice the amount of the duty to which it would be subjected if imported unwashed.

That is a provision of the wool-tariff law, which by some accident or other was omitted. It is quoted from the statutes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. After line 762 insert the following:

Sheep-skins and Angora goat-skins, raw or unmanufactured, imported with the wool on, washed or unwashed, 30 per cent. ad valorem on the skins alone.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. At the end of line 771, after the word "alpaca," insert a comma, so that it will read, "the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animal," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. As we are upon the subject of commas, I move to amend on page 619——

Mr. POLAND. Wait till we get to 619.

Mr. MYERS. I thought you had passed that.

Mr. POLAND. O, no; I am just coming to page 601.

Mr. MYERS. It seemed to me that as the question was upon commas, it would be well for me to move my amendment now.

Mr. POLAND. We may insert a great many commas before that.

Mr. MYERS. I wanted to strike one out.

Mr. POLAND. On page 601, after line 878, insert the following:

Argols, other than crude, six cents per pound.

Crude argols are on the free list.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. In line 900 strike out "black," and insert it after "ivory-drop;" so that it will read "bone or ivory-drop black, 25 per cent. ad valorem."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. Amend line 904 so that it will read, "Manufactures of bones, horn, ivory, or vegetable ivory, 35 per cent. ad valorem."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. Amend paragraph commencing line 791 so as to read:

Slack coal, or culm, such as will pass through a half-inch screen, forty cents per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel; bituminous coal and shale, seventy-five cents per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. Amend paragraphs 985 and 986 so as to read:

Compositions of glass or paste when set, 30 per cent. ad valorem; when not set, 10 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. Strike out, line 1002, which is intended to be on the free list, "crocus colcottra, 25 per cent. ad valorem."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. In line 1010 strike out the words "wool or worsted," and insert "linen or silk," so that it will read "embroidery—manufactures of cotton, wool, or silk," &c. In the same paragraph strike out the words "manufactures of linen or silk, 35 per cent. ad valorem."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. On page 603, in line 962, I move to amend by inserting a comma after the word "linen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move further to amend by inserting after line 1049, on page 605, the words, "fire-crackers not otherwise provided for, 30 per cent. ad valorem;" and on the same page, after line 1050, insert "Frankfort black, 25 per cent. ad valorem."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Vermont to line 1032. When the amendment was made in regard to copper, in line 507, the gentleman stated that eyelets were on the free list.

Mr. POLAND. I was mistaken in saying that they were on the free list. They are provided for in another place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thought the gentleman was mistaken.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by transferring the following words, in lines 1175 to 1178, page 608, inclusive, to page 610, after line 1249:

But the term "statuary," as used in the laws now in force imposing duties on foreign importations, shall be understood to include professional productions of a statuary or of a sculptor only.

The committee thought that these words ought not to be in the paragraph about "marble," but should be in another place.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out line 1247, which is as follows:

Paddy one cent and one-half per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by inserting on page 611, after line 1320, the following:

Provided, That any philosophical apparatus and instruments, imported for the use of any society incorporated for religious purposes, are subject to a duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. On the same page, in line 1335, the word "and" should be changed to "or," so that the clause will read, "plaster of Paris when ground or calcined."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by inserting a comma after the word "lead," in line 1313.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move the following amendments:

In line 1353, after the words "precious stones," insert "jewelry."
In line 1355, strike out the word "in," before "imitation," and insert "on."
In line 1376, insert after the words "provided for," the words "and rosin."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out line 1402, on page 613, and inserting the same on page 624, after line 427, in the free list.

The line proposed to be transferred is in these words:

Skins, dried, salted, or pickled, 10 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by inserting after line 1440 these words: "twine or pack thread not otherwise provided for, 35 per cent. ad valorem;" also by striking out lines 1457 and 1458 on the same page, and by inserting "vitriol" after the word "blue" in line 1463.

In relation to these lines, 1457 and 1458—"vegetable substances not enumerated, five dollars per ton and 10 per cent. ad valorem"—I will say that in several of the tariff acts where hemp, jute, sisal grass, and various other articles of that character were made liable to duty, the words "other vegetable substances used for cordage" were added. Finally, in one tariff act the words "used for cordage" were dropped out, while the words "other vegetable substances" were retained. The revisers seemed to think the language must be continued in that form. The words have never been used, in any tariff act we can find, in any other connection than with hemp, jute, and sisal grass, and generally in connection with the words "used for cordage." The committee did not believe that it was intended to include potatoes, turnips, &c. Therefore we recommend the striking out of the words.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on page 615, after line 7, in section 2501, to insert these words:

And all acids of every description used for chemical and manufacturing purposes, not otherwise provided for.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, in the same section, in line 5, near the top, to strike out the letter "e" and insert the letter "c," so it will read "succinic" instead of "suceinic."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on the same page, line 23, after the word "exported," to strike out the comma; so it will read:

American manufactures of casks, barrels, or carboys, and other vessels, and grain bags, (the manufacture of the United States,) if exported containing American produce, and declaration be made of intent to return the same empty, under such regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 616, line 89, after the word "birds," to insert "singing and other; and land and water fowl."

They are the very words of the statute. It has been decided by some court that land and water fowl are not birds. We follow simply the language of the statute.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 618 to make a verbal correction in line 163. The word which is printed "conian" should be "conium."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 619, in line 206, to strike out the letter "s" from "fruits" and the comma after "plants;" so it will read:

Fruit, plants tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move after the word "pieces" in line 214, page 619, to insert "and old glass;" so it will read:

Glass broken in pieces and old glass which cannot be cut for use, and fit only to be remanufactured.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I wish to say a word about the amendment which has been adopted. We propose to strike out the letter "s" from "fruits" and to strike out the comma after "plants" because they are not in Little & Brown's Statutes at Large. We propose to make it in the precise language and with the precise punctuation of the statute.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move on page 619, in line 206, to strike out the comma after the word "fruit," as just amended by the gentleman from Vermont, and I desire to make a statement in this connection.

Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered the first meeting we had on this subject I called the attention of the House to the fact that by the insertion of a comma, which had no business in the laws, we were losing half a million of revenue, and that already one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars had been refunded to parties. By placing a comma after the word "fruit" the Treasury Department, by some logic and law not known to me or my reading, has been able to decide that fruit is on the free list. I was answered that evening by the gentleman having charge of the bill, as I suppose I shall be this evening, they had to take the laws—Little & Brown's, I suppose—just as they were, comma for comma, colon for colon, and period for period, sense or no sense, I suppose, because in this instance that would have to be the result. Now, I take it we are here not to alter the laws and not to allow any misspelling to make them read otherwise than they should. The section is "fruit, plants," but the law on the subject must be taken with its context. On page 605 of the codification which we have here it will be found—

Fruits: oranges, lemons, pine-apples, and grapes, 20 per cent. ad valorem; limes, bananas, plantains, shaddocks, mangoes, 10 per cent. ad valorem; green, ripe, or dried, not otherwise provided for, 10 per cent. ad valorem; preserved in their own juice and fruit juice, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

On page 612 will be found "raisins, two and a half cents per pound," and elsewhere other fruits are so much a pound. If a comma is there, and it reads that fruit is free, the paragraphs are utterly contradictory. These gentlemen who have labored so faithfully—never men more faithfully than they have—told me the other evening this comma would have to remain, because they find it in Little & Brown's edition of the Statutes. Now I beg to differ from them.

Let me refer them to page 611. There you will find that—are 20 per cent. ad valorem. They might as well say, because a comma is put after the word "fruit," that fruit there is 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Plants: Fruit, shade, lawn, and ornamental trees, shrubs, plants, and flower-seeds, not otherwise provided for—

But on page 605 it will be found upon examination—it could not be found without that—that these gentlemen have undertaken to make an alteration, and very properly, because their duty has been performed most assiduously and faithfully. The paragraph at the foot of that page is as follows:

Fruits: Oranges, lemons, pine-apples, and grapes, 20 per cent. ad valorem; limes, bananas, plantains, shaddocks, mangoes, 10 per cent. ad valorem. But no allowance shall be made for loss by decay on the voyage, unless the loss shall exceed 25 per cent. of the quantity, and the allowance then made shall be only for the amount of loss in excess of 25 per cent. of the whole quantity. Green, ripe, or dried, not otherwise provided for, 10 per cent. ad valorem; preserved in their own juice, and fruit juice, 25 per cent. ad valorem.

That is not the way it read in the law originally. They have the right to put it that way because it does not alter the sense. Down to the word "quantity" it is according to the act of 1870. The clause "green, ripe, or dried," &c., is under the act of 1861. The clause "preserved," &c., is under the act of 1864. Now a semicolon follows the words "ad valorem;" and then they go on with another act.

They have the right to do this, because it does not alter the sense. They put semicolons frequently where they did not exist in the law; and they insert colons frequently, and commas ad libitum, to make sense. And yet they cannot strike out a comma to make sense and save the Government half a million dollars.

I know that these gentlemen are not any more familiar with the word which just precedes this one about which I am talking, but they have taken the liberty there, as they had the right to do, of spelling the word "fossils" correctly. In the act which they are quoting, and the language of which they say they must follow comma for comma, "fruit" has a comma after it, and they retain that comma after it; but when they found the word "fossels" in that statute, they have altered the "e" into an "i." Why? Because they had a right to make sense of it. And a little while ago the gentleman moved an amendment to change the word "mold" by putting a "u" into it.

Mr. POLAND. That is in the statute.

Mr. MYERS. Very well; I will leave that moldy word, but insist that they have altered the statute in reference to the word "fossels," so as to spell the word correctly as they had a right to do. And they had an equal right, where the thing is "fruit plants," not to leave it "fruit." This decision has been made in the Treasury Department, and, as I said, under that decision $250,000 have been refunded, and half a million dollars annually will be lost to the Government. The gentlemen say, and in good faith, that there is before the Committee on Ways and Means a bill which proposes to enact anew what was the law and which will strike out the comma. But how do we know that that bill will pass? That we cannot tell. We know what the law is.

And let me say, further, to the gentlemen of the committee that I have traced out the matter, and they will find over in the Senate committee that this whole sentence was inserted in the Senate. It read "plants, tropical or semi-tropical." I believe the amendment was offered by Senator MORRILL, and over it is written the word "fruit," with an insertion mark making it "fruit plants."

Now, this is "fruit plants," because the context shows it; because the whole bill shows it; because there is in another part of the bill and in a number of parts of the bill an imposition of duty on fruits. And why shall we not here make this read correctly and have some sense and have some revenue to the Government which we are seeking so much, instead of blindly saying that because a comma was there we will adhere to it? Now this can be done or else this House is powerless.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the gentleman for a question, although I do not know that he should interrupt me. This is probably only the second or third time I have said anything on the subject. I repeat, and I do so earnestly, that I believe this can be done.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does the gentleman insist that we can go back of the enrolled bill or act in the office of the Secretary of State?

Mr. MYERS. I have already given the gentleman an Irishman's answer to that. I have shown him that the committee have so gone back, and I could show it in a hundred instances.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, I would ask him if it has not been the constant effort of the gentlemen who have had charge of this revision to make the law conform to the decisions of the Department; whether their amendments have not tended to conform not only to the language of the law but to the decisions of the Government?

Mr. MYERS. I think not.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think I can show several instances where that is done.

Mr. LAWRENCE. We have not varied the words of the statute for that purpose.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman will look at what we have passed in reference to "crude argols," he will find that they have conformed the duty to the decision of the Department. In the original law it was "argols or crude tartar." They have left "crude tartar" out of the free list altogether, and put in "crude argols." That is the language here; and that change is made for the very reason or purpose, as I suppose, of conforming this codification to the decisions of the Department. And that seems to have been the effort of the committee; not only to reconcile the statutes, but to conform the codification to the decisions of the Department. I so suggested to the gentlemen several times, and yet they insist that no amendment shall be made. They leave out whole chapters and whole sections, and in a few words attempt to give us what the law is, and yet they refuse other gentlemen here the opportunity of making a single amendment to make certain the law, which is very uncertain.

Mr. KELLEY. If my colleague [Mr. MYERS] will permit me, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] whether there is any difference between "crude argols" and the other phrase he uses?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I might answer the gentleman just as lucidly as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] answered me a little while ago, that I do not know. It is not material whether I know or not. The language of the original act was "argols and crude tartar;" that was in the free list. Now we have in the free list here only "crude argols."

Mr. KELLEY. If "argols" means "crude tartar," and "crude tartar" means "argols," why should all three words be used?

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is what I want to know. It is said that it was held by the Department that "crude tartar" was the same thing as "argols." Hence, they put in this revision "crude argols." In the statute "argols" was put in the free list with "crude tartar." Now, in order to conform it to the decision of the Department, they have put in this revision only "crude argols."

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] will allow me to say a word about "argols" while he is looking up his comma——

Mr. MYERS. I do not need to look it up, for I have it all here.

Mr. POLAND. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] is entirely mistaken in supposing that we are trying to back up any Department doctrine or decision in this case or in any case. Now, upon this subject of "argols," I have not looked to see how it was in the earlier statutes. But in the very latest statutes it is "crude argols" in the free list. And it is quite evident from their use of this language that there is another description of "argols" not covered by the description "crude." And I learn that argols are scarcely ever imported in a crude condition, but the article imported is on the way to make cream of tartar. We have therefore inserted here the words "argols not crude" as subject to duty. We have followed no decision of the Department, but we have endeavored to embrace just what we find to be in the statute.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] refer me to the page and line where he has made "argols not crude" subject to duty?

Mr. POLAND. No, sir.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If he can, then he can do what I have not been able to do.

Mr. POLAND. The law says that "crude argols" may come in free; we say that the law remains that "argols not crude" are subject to duty.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman give me the page where "argols" are subjected to duty?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is what I would like to know.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It was inserted as an amendment, on page 601, after line 878.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MYERS. I do not believe that the committee are trying to make the law accord with any decision of the Department. They have been trying very faithfully to do their duty. But they must not object when gentlemen come here and point out to them a mistake and show them out of their own mouths that they are mistaken; they must not object to that, but be willing to let the House do as they please. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has asked me to point out where there had been any alteration of the enrolled bill, and I will give him one. Ex uno disce omnes. He likes quotations, and I give him a maxim, though I believe I have never made a Latin quotation on this floor before.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Which means "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." [Laughter.]

Mr. MYERS. Yes. Now on page 611 of this revision, the paragraph from lines 1331 to 1334, inclusive, is as follows:

Plants: Fruit, shade, lawn, and ornamental trees, shrubs, plants, and flower-seeds, not otherwise provided for; garden seeds, and all other seeds for agricultural and horticultural purposes, not otherwise provided for, 20 per centum ad valorem.

How does it read in the enrolled bill, or in Little & Brown? It reads: "On fruit, shade, lawn, and ornamental trees," &c. The "on" is entirely omitted in this revision, which gives "plants" as a heading, and then "fruit, shade, lawn, and ornamental trees," &c. The word "on" is left out, the commas are put in; and, as I have shown in another case——

Mr. LAWRENCE. The sense is exactly the same.

Mr. MYERS. Of course, and I want the sense to be exactly the same. The gentleman asks me where they have altered the existing law? I say to him that they have done so in five hundred places in order to conform to the sense. I have shown just now a case where three laws have been incorporated into one, and where a semicolon had been put in place of a period. It did not alter the sense. It was right to make the change. I am not quarreling with the committee.

Mr. POLAND. Does the gentleman want the committee to alter the law?

Mr. MYERS. No, sir; I claim that you have done your duty well; that you have spent upon this work a great deal of time and labor, for which perhaps the country will never sufficiently thank you; but I claim that you are not perfection, and that as you have made alterations in certain places in order to convey the sense of the laws, we have a right to make an alteration here with the same view. I invite any member of the committee reporting this bill, especially the gentleman from Vermont, to say whether the sense of this provision was that fruit plants or fruit was to be free. Before the gentleman answers that question, however, I see that my amiable friend from New York [Mr. HALE] wants to propound an inquiry to me; and I am ready to hear him.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] is citing particular instances in which he says the committee have altered the language without altering the meaning. Now, I ask him whether he thinks that the alteration he proposes will or will not change the meaning?

Mr. MYERS. I think that the amendment which I propose, conforming as it does to what was written in the law and what was passed by Congress, will not alter the meaning.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Does my friend mean that it does not alter the meaning of the provision in the statute, or that it does not alter the meaning of the enrolled bill? I understand the gentleman to be arguing that his amendment is an alteration, and that the provision ought to be altered, because the law intended something else.

Mr. MYERS. I will answer the gentleman. Perhaps I cannot explain myself as lucidly as my friend from New York; but I supposed that every gentleman on this floor understood my proposition. I undertake to say that if there had been no decision in the Treasury Department making a question upon the meaning of this paragraph, deciding that fruit came in free, although a number of previous paragraphs provided that various kinds of fruits should pay duty, there would have been no objection whatever in this House to striking out the comma, which was inserted by mistake, and making the language read "fruit plants."

Mr. LAWRENCE. How do you understand that?

Mr. MYERS. Does not my friend understand me? Have I not made myself clear?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Perfectly clear.

Mr. MYERS. Then just as the gentleman has left out the word "on," just as he has inserted semicolons, just as he has come to his rounded periods whenever he wanted to, so I affirm (and I point to the instances) the committee have left out words that are to be found in Little & Brown's publication of the laws.

Mr. LAWRENCE. We have not altered the law.

Mr. MYERS. Nor does this alter the law.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does it not alter the law from what it was in the enrolled bill?

Mr. MYERS. Let me say in this connection that I am earnest in this matter; I believe these gentlemen of the committee are earnest; but I have not yet been answered sufficiently. I agree with them that leaving the comma in does not make the sense different; that with the comma in the provision means fruit plants, because it could mean nothing else. That being the meaning, and as leaving the comma out would make it no worse and no better, I propose to have the language as the context shows was the intention of Congress in passing the law, so that we shall not have any more such decisions in the Treasury Department. The decision may have been made—no doubt it was made—with perfect honesty; but we ought to know the meaning of the laws we pass; and inasmuch as the gentlemen of the committee have done what they pleased with grammar and punctuation in order to make the language conform to the sense, I propose to strike out this comma, so as to make this provision conform more perfectly to the sense; which we have a right to do, unless I have read the law to very little purpose. I would like some answer upon this point before we pass from it, and I wish also a vote upon the question.

Mr. POLAND. I do not propose to enter into a very long debate with my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS.] It is undoubtedly true, as he says, that these revisers of the statutes have changed the phraseology of the laws to a great extent; they have left out a great many words that they deemed unnecessary and unmeaning; they have endeavored to improve the phraseology; and where they wanted to extract what was the existing law from a large number of statutes they have taken from all of them what seemed to be in force, and have cast a new form of statute, embracing the substance of the existing law. Hence, in reference to the motion of my friend from Pennsylvania to strike out this comma, I have no complaint to make that it proposes to go beyond what the jurisdiction of the revisers or the committee in going over this work would authorize. But I understand that the gentleman himself is entirely content that the purpose of this revision should be what it proposes to be—a codification of the laws as they existed at the commencement of the present session of Congress. What he proposes, he says, is not any alteration of the law. Now, Mr. Speaker, that brings us to the very point. Does everybody agree to that? The gentleman himself says that a high officer of the Government has decided that the law is directly contrary to what the gentleman himself claims, and that decision has been made, he says, at the expense of a million or two of dollars to the Government.

Now, the question as to the true construction of this law, whether it puts fruit on the free list or leaves fruit subject to duty, is a question in which a great many people of this country are interested. The rights of numbers of persons depend on the decision of the question.

Mr. MYERS. I defended the gentleman—he needs, however, no defense from me—but I defended him against the intimation of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] which was that these gentlemen were conforming their codification of the statutes here to the decisions in the Department. Now, it would appear as if that was being done in this instance.

Mr. POLAND. O, no!

Mr. MYERS. I wish to ask one question: Does this read "fruit plants" in his opinion? We are entitled to his mature judgment. Does it read "fruit plants" or "fruit?" Which should be upon the free list?

Mr. POLAND. I do not suppose it makes any sort of difference what my opinion is.

Mr. MYERS. Yes, it does, a great deal.

Mr. POLAND. Perhaps I might agree with my friend from Pennsylvania, whether the comma is there or is not there, it does not make any sort of difference in the law; but it is a question touching the rights of men in relation to this, as they claim the construction of the law depends on whether that comma remains there or not. Therefore while this is an important question, we deem it enough for our purpose and the fulfillment of our duty, where this was not a number of statutes to be brought together and out of them to extract what is the essence and spirit and meaning of the law. But here is a single line in the statute about which there is a difference as to its legal construction and meaning, and whether it is to be construed as making "fruits" free, or whether it is to be construed as making only "fruit plants" free, is a question which may vary the rights of a great many men. We do not feel at liberty to change it while we are not legislating at all, while we are merely undertaking to bring forward just what are the existing statutes. And all there is of this is one single line. If we leave it on the statute-book just where we find it, with the precise words and in their precise order and with their precise punctuation as they stand on the statutes, we think we have exactly fulfilled our duty to the House and the country.

Mr. MYERS. Is the word "fruits" in the law?

Mr. POLAND. No.

Mr. MYERS. That has been a long answer, and I do not know what is the gentleman's opinion, whether he means "fruit plants" or "fruits." We have a right to his opinion, even if the Treasury Department has decided.

Mr. POLAND. I thought I answered. It is a matter of no account which way I think it is.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am astonished at the gentleman's remark, I confess, but it is not the first time I have been astonished. I have been astonished at the amount of labor the gentleman has done, and the amount of industry he has exhibited. I commend him for that. The gentleman says it is a matter of no sort of account what his opinion is on this subject. I think the gentleman certainly ought not to be so understood. All of the gentlemen of the committee have told us they were boiling down into one volume sixteen or seventeen volumes of statutes, and in doing that they have to extract what they believe the law to be in any given and in every given case. Now, then, the gentleman tells us here is a statute which he tells us it is of no earthly consequence what his opinions are on it. Yet he is extracting the law and putting sixteen volumes into one, giving us the gist of it, and making it clear and unmistakable. Nevertheless he tells us he has no opinion on it he is willing to give the House. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania he coolly tells us it is no sort of consequence what his opinion is on a given statute.

Mr. MYERS. I will read the language which is so much talked about: "Fruit, plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation." Should that read "fruits" to make sense?

Mr. POLAND. I do not suppose we should contract the statutes or we could get them into less space by striking out this comma. [Laughter.] So far as brevity is concerned, we would not accomplish much by striking out this comma.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask in all candor whether it is not of some sort of consequence whether the comma should be out or in? Whether the law would be clearly expressed with the comma in, or whether it would be more clearly expressed with the comma out?

Mr. O'NEILL. I would suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that at last "ye shall know them by their fruits."

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. POLAND. It is from the Bible; you will not understand that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman from Vermont yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] insists that the proper construction of this statute requires the striking out of the comma, because he says it is inconsistent with the other provisions. He states that it is inconsistent with the other portions of the statute which provide for a duty on fruits; and on that the gentleman from Pennsylvania based his argument that this could not have been intended as a separate word, "fruit," with a comma following it.

Now, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the paragraph, the provisions of which he referred to, laying the duties upon fruits—"oranges, lemons, pine-apples, bananas," &c.—is not a part of the same statute by which this free list was created, but belongs to a statute passed some two years previously. The statute of 1870 placed a tax on certain fruits—oranges, lemons, pine-apples, &c.—and is found in volume 16 of Little & Brown's Statutes, on page 265. The statute of 1872 contained the words which are in question here, placing on the free list "fruit, plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation."

Mr. MYERS. I understand the gentleman's point, and to relieve his anxiety I will state——

Mr. HALE, of New York. Allow me a single moment.

Mr. MYERS. And I will answer that fully.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Now, then, I think we come right to the meaning of the Treasury decision and to the very gist of the question, whether we are here to change the law by undertaking to strike out the comma. The decision of the Treasury Department was that this word "fruit" included in the free list, as I understand this decision, was a word standing by itself and constituting fruit an item upon the free list. That being so, they held, and they must have held of necessity, that it repealed the provisions of the act of 1870, which laid a tax upon oranges, lemons, pine-apples, grapes, &c. And there precisely was the ground on which the Treasury was justified in so doing, if the statute read as it appears on the face of it to have read, "fruit" constituting an item by itself, while "plants" designed for propagation, &c., constitute another item upon the free list.

Now in this revision—and the matter it seems to me is an important one—the committee have retained in their report, and give us on page 605, the provisions of the act of 1870 taxing oranges, lemons, pine-apples, &c. There it seems to me they are wrong. If the construction of the Treasury Department was right, that clause was repealed by the act of 1872 placing fruit upon the free list. Therefore I think the committee, if they retained "fruit" with the comma here, should have struck out the paragraph on page 605, beginning with line 1054; because, occurring in the same statute, they are inconsistent with each other.

Mr. MYERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] has finished, I will proceed to answer the point he has attempted to make.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] proceeds, will he allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MYERS. Let me answer one at a time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] has the floor. He will state to whom he yields.

Mr. POLAND. I think it is now the turn of my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] and I yield to him.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. His amendment, as I understand, is to strike out a certain comma between "fruit" and "plants." His object is to make the sentence read "fruit plants," as though "fruit" and "plants" were parts of one word. Now, I ask him if he accomplishes his object by striking out the comma, without inserting a hyphen between the words? He is a learned gentleman——

Mr. MYERS. Not at all. The learning of the House is almost centered in the committee.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The gentleman has translated books from foreign languages, from languages other than our own, and I therefore appeal to him as a learned gentleman.

Mr. MYERS. We are now discussing the construction of the English language, in which my friend from Ohio ought to be well versed. To the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE,] I will say, though not at all disrespectfully, that his argument is not worth a fig. In the same act where "fruit, plants, tropical and semi-tropical," are inserted—in the same act, not another—we have "figs, two and a half cents per pound;" "raisins, two and a half cents per pound;" "dates and prunes, one cent per pound;" "currants, Zante or other, one cent per pound."

Mr. HALE, of New York. Are dates, prunes, &c., fruits?

Mr. MYERS. I think they are fruits, and a duty is imposed upon them. Yet the insertion of this comma would allow certain gentlemen still to read that fruit is on the free list. The gentleman sought out a paragraph belonging to another act, and founded his argument upon that. I suppose he intended to do what was right; but he did not know that I would find in the very same act something that would destroy his argument. I refer the gentleman to a section which establishes the fact that duties are imposed on fruits of various kinds, which is not consistent with fruit being on the free list.

Mr. HALE, of New York. As I understand, the Treasury Department do not hold that currants, dates, &c., come in under the head of fruit; but that the green fruits on which duties were imposed by the act of 1870 do come under that designation.

Mr. MYERS. I will say that these answers continually bring us to a fact, which I did not before suppose to be a fact, that the gentlemen who reported this code are led away by the decisions of the Treasury Department.

Mr. LAWRENCE. O, no.

Mr. MYERS. They refer to them constantly.

Mr. POLAND. I referred to them merely to show that there was a controversy as to the meaning of this paragraph, and that we did not understand it to be our business to decide as to the meaning of a statute that was in controversy and upon which the rights of parties were depending.

Mr. MYERS. I still come back to the point——

Mr. POLAND. You charge us with——

Mr. MYERS. I charge you with nothing, only of laboring too much, and of giving us but little credit when we try to labor with you in what we deem to be the right direction. I asked a question, to which I failed to get an answer, of the very learned, able, and distinguished gentleman and lawyer who reported this code, [Mr. POLAND,] whether he thought this meant "fruit plants" or not. He evaded the question, and very properly, perhaps, because he cannot give any answer but the one I had indicated. I read the sentence "fruit plants, tropical and semi-tropical"—what for? "For purposes of propagation or cultivation." Now if it means that fruit should be on the free list, then will it mean that fruit is imported for propagation or cultivation? Sir, that is not the meaning of the statute.

These gentlemen, in gathering up these various statutes, putting in and leaving out commas and colons here and there, endeavor to get at the meaning of the law. But it shows itself on this floor that there is a fear that they shall offend some high officer of the Government who has decided otherwise. Instead of being a law unto ourselves, instead of saying manfully and rightfully what we believe the law to be, we put what seems to be sense in some sections and nonsense in others.

Mr. LAWRENCE. What about the hyphen?

Mr. MYERS. The gentleman wants to know, if a comma is struck out, whether I will not have to put in a hyphen. Not at all, though there would be no objection to it.

Mr. FIELD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] that he modify his amendment so as to strike the letter "s" out of "fruits," and to insert a hyphen between "fruit" and "plants."

Mr. MYERS. The letter "s" should also be struck out. The gentlemen put in an "s," thinking it meant fruits, and they found by looking at Little & Brown that the "s" was not there.

Mr. POLAND. We did not put it in there.

Mr. MYERS. It was in the print; I saw it there.

Mr. POLAND. We did not make the print.

Mr. MYERS. Very well; I apologize on the "s" question.

Mr. FIELD. I think a hyphen would improve the meaning very much.

Mr. MYERS. I would have no objection at all, except that it is very plain as it is. We are inserting nothing at all. It would read as intended, as I read it, "fruit plants."

I will now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.]

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I think I can answer the question which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] asked. I will premise, so that he will listen with more candor to my explanation, that the conclusion I have come to agrees with his own.

Mr. MYERS. I always listen carefully to the gentleman.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I say that I have not been aware that the committee had in any case endeavored to change their views of the law, or the letter of the law, to correspond to any decision of the Department. We have in several cases, in one or two of which I had the honor to explain to the House on previous evenings, where the law was ambiguous, where, on the reading of the words, it was equally susceptible of either construction, and where there has been a uniform usage and practice of the Government under the law, commencing from the time it passed, and continuing a series of years—we have considered that the rule of contemporaneous construction was sufficient to justify us in making the language of the law clear and explicit in conformity thereto. I believe that is the rule adopted always in the construction of laws by the courts. We have done it to that extent only.

Now I concur with my friend from Pennsylvania, that it is necessary for the chairman of our committee to have an opinion upon the meaning of this statute. There was once a judge in my State who had two young men before him to be examined for admission to the bar. After the examination was over, he came into court and said that he had examined those two young men, had asked them about a hundred questions each, and only one out of the whole lot had been answered correctly; that is, he asked one of them what an escrow meant, and he said he did not know. [Laughter.]

Mr. POLAND. What State did they come from? [Laughter.]

Mr. E. R. HOAR. That is a point I never inquired about. The reason that I think this House, and perhaps therefore the Committee on Revision, should have a conclusion upon the meaning of this statute is this: In a former act "fruits" were included, with an enumeration of various kinds, such as "oranges, bananas, pine-apples, lemons, grapes," &c. That was taken from a former statute, which imposed those duties, and the committee have reported it here without alteration. Now, it is obvious that if the meaning of this phraseology is that fruits are made free, we should not leave in this revision those other provisions to be re-enacted. We should report that they be stricken out; because the very object of this revision was that where there were upon the statute-book two laws apparently contradictory, it should be determined which was the existing law, and that the one found not to be in force should not be included in the revision. It would seem to follow that if the Treasury construction of this provision is correct, there is no law in force such as is found on page 605; and if that construction is incorrect, then the language of the statute, which allows the laws in regard to fruit on page 605 to stand, should be made so explicit and clear (although we may change the phraseology) as to give the meaning of this second provision. I am afraid, therefore, that the committee, as a part of their duty, will be obliged to determine what the meaning of this provision is, whether corresponding with the construction of the Treasury Department or not.

Now as to the reasons why the Treasury Department would say dried fruits were not covered by this. In the same statute in which is found this critical provision that we are dissecting in regard to fruit plants, there are found specific duties on dates, prunes, figs, and other dried fruits. But it is also true that in the former statute, which contained the general provision found on page 605, giving the enumeration of these fresh fruits—oranges, lemons, and pine-apples—gentlemen will find, in line 1005, dates and prunes, and in line 1044, figs. Therefore, dried fruits were distinguished from fruits just as much in the previous statute as they would be in this. If the statute we are considering had, without saying anything about tropical plants, provided that fruits should be on the free list, it would, of course, be consistent with having dates, prunes, &c., subjected to specific duties in the same statute, just as in the former statute fruits were embraced under one provision and dried fruits under another.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the fact that he is in error in supposing that the word "fruits," which appears in the report of the committee on page 605, is found in the statute of 1870. It is not found there. The duty is only on oranges, bananas, &c., not enumerated as fruits. The word "fruits" is placed as a heading.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The gentleman from New York is correct on that point; but fresh fruits are enumerated in a separate clause from dried fruits.

Mr. MYERS. The answer which has been made is perfectly satisfactory; and I would not quibble about dried fruits. I only illustrated that they were in the same act. It does not matter which act they are in; we are enacting a code. But still the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] agreeing with me in my first proposition, and agreeing that the committee should answer and should do one thing or the other—either strike out the previous section or do as I propose, make the language read at all events (with or without the hyphen) "fruit plants." I call his attention further to the fact that, though deciding against his colleague on the committee, he has not himself yet expressed an opinion as to what should be done. Therefore I ask him whether the language "fruit, plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation," can in his judgment mean fruit?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I have no hesitation in answering that in my opinion it very clearly never was intended to make fresh fruits free; and that the construction adopted by the Treasury Department should have been different.

Mr. MYERS. And the words "for propagation" serve to illustrate the meaning?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I think that whatever will make the meaning clear—whether by the use of the words "fruit plants for propagation or cultivation," or the use of a hyphen, or by the change of the letter "s"—should be adopted by the House. This is the course which as an individual I should favor. Though members of the committee are not obliged to express their individual opinions, I think the House must decide as to what the statute should contain.

Mr. MYERS. I move to strike out the comma after the word "fruit," and to insert a hyphen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, as the Chair understands, modifies his previous motion so as to strike out the comma and connect the two words by a hyphen, making the language read "fruit-plants."

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I submit that the hyphen ought not to be inserted.

Mr. MYERS. I am not tenacious about that.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. The word "fruit" is used as an adjective as well as a noun. We talk of "fruit trees," &c.; and in this very schedule the word is used as an adjective.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say, before I sit down, that in what I said in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania I was not speaking for the committee, as I had no authority to speak for the committee, but I was simply giving, in answer to his interrogatory, my own individual opinion.

Mr. POLAND. After what has been said, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word more, not, however, to prolong this discussion. It is quite clear to the committee, having examined this work, having recommended no change in relation to that provision taxing fruits by name or by description, if they understood this line put fruits on the free list, they would have changed one or the other. It would not require a very remarkably wise man to determine what the opinion of the committee must have been as to the legal meaning of this section. But the view the committee took of it as to their duty what they ought to do: we do not suppose, where here is a single statute, although it may be doubtful in its meaning—people might differ as to what its true construction was; there may be litigation pending; the rights of parties depend on it; where it should be; we did not understand—at least I did not understand—it came within the purview of this committee to solve all doubtful questions of law. If here are half a dozen statutes, and the statutes have been amended in various particulars, of course, in order to condense, in order to reduce them, the duty of the reviser, the duty of the committee, in looking over the work, is semi-judicial. But here was a single line in a very recent statute upon which there was a dispute as to the meaning, and the rights of parties depended on it; and though apparent enough to the committee what the opinion must be as to the meaning and the right construction of it by any sensible Department, or any sensible man at the head of the Department, they did not deem it to be their duty to change that single line of the law at all, but to let it stand just as they found it in the statute. And I for one did not deem it my duty to undertake to pass judgment and change that law so as to make the meaning of it clear in one direction or the other.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman tell us why he gave the answer that it was entirely immaterial and of no sort of consequence what his opinion of it was?

Mr. POLAND. That is my view at this very moment. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman tells us he thinks no man could have had any doubt as to what the opinion of the committee was of that language.

Mr. POLAND. That was their good luck. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. I submit to the gentleman he is exceedingly modest, and giving more credit to the gentleman who had an opinion of the meaning of this language than to himself. He said, however, it was of no sort of consequence what his opinion was.

Mr. POLAND. I say if the committee understood this statute to bear the meaning they say some people give to it, it is very clear they could not have left another statute which they had compiled and left in force which they said would be in conflict with that construction.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I really supposed the gentleman from Vermont intended we should understand that answer he gave to me, that he did not know, should apply to this.

Mr. POLAND. Not that I did not know, but it was nobody's business what I did know. [Laughter.]

Mr. CASON. Mr. Speaker, I wish only to say one word on this question, and I will occupy only for a moment the attention of the House. I do not understand, when the chairman of the committee says it is not any business of the House what his opinion is as to the construction of this law, he means by that to say it is not the business of the House to know what his opinion is in relation to the statute. I understand him to mean this, that when you come to give a construction to the statute and make it plain, one way or the other, that is a construction which a court would have to give it, that is a construction from the language of the law. But I say here, Mr. Speaker, it is not the proper duty, it is not required of us, to state what our opinion of the construction of the law is. It is our duty to say what we find a law to be.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is precisely what the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] would not say. He says it is nobody's business what the opinion of the committee was on that point.

Mr. CASON. We find this law to be "fruits," with a comma, "plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation." That is what we find the law to be. Now let the gentleman give it the construction he pleases.

Mr. LAWRENCE. We find the law to be expressed in those words.

Mr. CASON. Yes, sir; we find it expressed in those words, and we find it nowhere else; and when they ask us to give it a construction they ask us to do the duty of a court.

Mr. MYERS. I will ask the gentlemen if they have not conscientiously tried to ascertain the sense of the laws; if they have not dovetailed them as they judged they should be.

Mr. CASON. We have presented this revision as we judged the statutes to be, not as we judged the construction of a court would be. We have endeavored to ascertain what the language of these statutes, the literal letter of them, means.

Mr. MYERS. Does the gentleman understand that fruit can be imported for the purpose of propagation?

Mr. CASON. I do not say anything about that. I say I find these words in the statute, and that is sufficient for me and should be sufficient for the gentleman from Pennsylvania unless he wants to change the law.

Mr. MYERS. I have stated that I have found instances in which the committee have inserted the word "on" and inserted semicolons which are not in the law.

Mr. CASON. But you will find that none of those changes alter the letter of the law. But if you make this change you do alter the letter of the law.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It would seem that if we take the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CASON] and the speech of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] it is of no sort of consequence what the committee think.

Mr. CASON. I leave the gentleman to decide that for himself. I do not think it matters very much to the House whether our speeches exactly correspond or not.

But I wish to say a word more on this matter and then I have done. It has been stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] that the committee is captious in relation to accepting amendments. I think that the chairman of this committee has said time and again, and several members of the committee have repeated it, that we are anxious to have information and suggestions from any person and from every person. We have listened with the greatest patience to all kinds of suggestions and we are anxious to have them. We are anxious to receive suggestions on this matter; and we are not, as I understand the committee, at all tenacious whether this amendment is made or not. As we report the section it is our opinion, and we hold that opinion just as honestly as the gentleman from Pennsylvania holds his opinion, that we give what is found in the law. We are perfectly willing to hear the gentleman from Wisconsin on any question, but we cannot agree with him when he gets up and says that because he as an individual member of this House makes a suggestion to the committee, the committee ought to ignore their own judgment, arrived at after careful and considerate study. And yet at the same time the gentleman charges us with being captious because we do not give our opinion. I do not understand how the gentleman can make it out that he is consistent with himself in relation to that.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CASON] to say that the committee were perfectly willing to give their opinion. Taking him at his word, will he tell us what he thinks is intended by the portion of the statute now under consideration?

Mr. CASON. When did I make the statement to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Almost in the last sentence which the gentleman uttered.

Mr. CASON. I did not mean to say that. I said we were willing to hear all sorts of suggestions. I did not speak of giving my opinion, but said we were willing to hear the opinions of any person.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Then, as one of the committee, you are unwilling to give your opinion of that statute?

Mr. CASON. I am not. I am willing to state that I understand the statute to be just as it reads. And if the gentleman wants to construe it one way, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] wants to construe it in another way, and the Treasury Department want to construe it their way, they have the right to do it. But I say the statute is just as it reads.

Mr. WILBER. But if, by a particular construction of the statute, we are losing $500,000 a year, should it not be changed?

Mr. CASON. The gentleman says if we are losing $500,000 annually by this construction of the statute it ought to be changed. I think if there is any doubt about the construction of the law there ought to be an act changing it. But we stated at the outset, on the very first evening that the House met to consider this revision, that we were to take the law as we found it on a certain day.

Now, as I said a few moments ago, I do not understand that the committee are tenacious whether this change is made or not. All that we ask is simply this: when we report what we think the law to be, we submit that matter to the House. If the House desire to change it from what we report it, then let them change it; the committee will not quarrel about that. We simply ask to have our own views in relation to this question; to bring the law before you as we think it is. If the House think the law should be changed from what we report it, then the House have the right to change it. But do not let members come forward, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] has several times done, and say that the committee have changed the law.

Mr. WILBER. If the committee have changed the statute in any places to make it just cover the exact meaning intended, then why not change this, if we feel confident that is the case here?

Mr. CASON. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] has given the reason for that; whether it is a good reason or not it is for the House to determine. The gentleman from Vermont has already said that there may be litigation; that there has been a construction of this law by one of the Departments of the Government; that the language here is susceptible of more than one construction. And finding that to be the fact, we did not feel like taking the responsibility on ourselves to determine the question by construing it one way or the other, but we gave the identical language as we found it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CASON] tell the House whether, in his opinion, if the comma is struck out it will change the meaning of the law?

Mr. CASON. I will answer as the gentleman from Vermont did; I do not think it is any business of the House what my opinion is. It is the duty of the House to determine the question. If I wanted to educate the House, then I might tell the gentleman what my opinion is. I presume he can tell that as well as I can. If he will agree to vote according as I will give my opinion, then I can see some reason for giving it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am not here to drive a sharp bargain with my friend from Indiana.

Mr. CASON. I understand that very well.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Nor would I enter into such an arrangement, because it might not be parliamentary. But the learned gentleman having examined this statute with the other gentlemen of the committee, and knowing precisely what it is, I think that since the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS,] who is very captious always, determines to knock this comma out, I would like to know of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CASON] whether that would change the effect of the law or not? I ask him in all candor.

Mr. CASON. That is not the question for us to determine, but what the law is as we find it. But to accommodate the gentleman I will give him my opinion. My impression is that if the comma was out it would not change the true construction of the law. I give that opinion simply as a gratuitous matter, not that I think it is our right, or our privilege even, to state to the House what are our individual opinions of the law.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If it would not change the meaning of the law, would it not lessen the size of this volume to knock a comma out? [Laughter.]

Mr. CASON. I can answer that question just about as well by saying that if the representation from Wisconsin in this House was one less, perhaps it would lessen the representation of that State.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think so, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. CASON. And so I suppose, if this comma is struck out, there would be one less comma in the statute.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that it will be of any use for me to say what I am going to say. I wish to say a few words as to the way we have got into this difficulty. I undertook the other day to tell how it came about, but I did not tell quite all, and I would like to tell the rest of it now.

As I said the other day, all there was about fruits in the free list in the bill when the Committee on Ways and Means reported it to the House was struck out; so that when the bill went to the Senate there was not a word in the bill about fruits in the free list. But over among the "P's" in the free list was "plants tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation." Some gentleman in the Senate, for the purpose of restricting that clause, moved this amendment, which was written in, right over the word "plants," the word "fruit," with a caret before the word "plants," and it appears on the paper in that way, so that one would naturally read "fruit plants," as one would read "Zante currants," over on page 604. It occurred to that gentleman in the Senate that "plants tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation" was a little broader than he wanted it to be, and he wanted to restrict it a little more, and to say that what was meant was "fruit plants," and nothing else. So he wrote the word "fruit" over the word "plants," and put a caret right before the word "plants." I think that there never was any hyphen between the words. When the provision came to be written out, the gentlemen who wrote it out did not quite understand what was meant by this language, "plant fruit." They concluded that what was intended was "fruit plants," and they put it among the F's. I think when gentlemen come to look at the original papers they will find that is the way it got there.

Then at the State Department there is an old gentleman whose business it is to superintend the printing of a copy of the laws for the use of the Departments before Little & Brown's edition is printed. He has been in the habit of putting in commas, &c.; of fixing the punctuation of bills just as he thinks they ought to be. There has never been any difficulty in such matters, because it has been very apparent in our other statutes where the commas, &c., ought to be, and no such importance is attached to them as in a tariff law. The probability is (though I do not know anything about it) that when this gentleman prepared the copy of this law for general use about the Departments, he threw in the comma at that place, and that in this way it got there.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. How is it in the enrolled bill?

Mr. DAWES. I have not seen the enrolled bill myself, but I am told to-night by one of the enrolling clerks that in the manuscript there is no "s" after the word "fruit."

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. Is there a comma?

Mr. DAWES. When the word "fruit" was written over the top of the word "plant," there was no comma.

Mr. BROMBERG. How is it in the enrolled bill?

Mr. DAWES. As I have just said, I have not seen the enrolled bill myself. The Committee on Ways and Means had this matter before them, and they have agreed upon some measures on this subject—among others that their chairman should go and look at the enrolled bill; but he has not done so.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I am told by a gentleman who has seen the enrolled bill that the comma is in that. But, sir, a court or a Department ought to disregard punctuation in the construction of a law, for the reason that the punctuation is never put in by the action of Congress. That is the work of a committee or of a clerk, and it ought not to interfere with the true construction of a statute. Now, it has sometimes happened that where an original statute has been amended, the amendatory statute again amended, and perhaps another amendment made on top of that, the committee has found it utterly impossible to select any words of the existing statutes which would convey the present state of the law. In such a case the revisers have necessarily translated the law into their own words so as to convey the idea intended. But where, as in this case, the existing law is found in a recent statute, unamended, in the words which have been adopted by Congress, the revisers have generally thought it proper, and I think the committee has in every instance thought it proper, to adopt the words which Congress has employed; and in this instance we have done so, lest it might be said that the committee had changed the existing law. We have adopted the statute verbatim et literatim et punctuatim.

But with the single exception of a case like this, where the attention of Congress, or one branch of it, is called to the punctuation and it is put in or left out by order of Congress, a punctuation point ought not to interfere with the construction of a statute; and a court or head of a Department that would boggle and blunder over it does not, in my judgment, understand its or his duty.

Mr. KELLEY. Why can we not come to a vote and get this comma out of the way?

Mr. MYERS. Enough has been said about it; I do not desire to say anything further.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. MYERS to strike out the comma and insert a hyphen between "fruit" and "plants,"

The SPEAKER pro tempore declared that the "ayes" appeared to prevail.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a division.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will not insist on his call for a division.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist that the proposition involves a deviation from what has been understood to be the function of this committee.

Mr. POLAND. I suggest to my friend from Indiana that he withdraw his call for a division, and allow me to enter a motion to reconsider the vote on this amendment, so that the question can be called up when the House is full.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no disposition to prolong what has certainly not been a very profitable discussion. With the understanding that a motion to reconsider shall be entered, I withdraw the call for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. And I enter a motion to reconsider, so that if we choose to call it up in a full House we can do so.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider another vote that has been taken to-night. On page 595, line 601, the House, on motion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] voted to amend by adding "s" and inserting a comma after "tank-bottom," in the clause "tank-bottom sirup of sugar-cane juice." The chairman of the committee, [Mr. POLAND,] in whom I have great confidence, assured us that this phraseology was wrong; that the language intended was "tank-bottoms," as an item of itself, and "sirup of sugar-cane juice" as another separate item. Now, with all my confidence in the gentleman's legal knowledge, I think he is mistaken in this matter of sirups. I refer him to the original statute on page 262 of the sixteenth volume of the Statutes at Large, where the clause is in these words: "Tank-bottom sirup of sugar-cane juice," precisely as it is in the printed report, and not as it is in the amendment which the House has adopted. I therefore think that, following the rule of the committee, we should reconsider the vote on that amendment, and leave the provision so as to levy a duty on tank-bottom sirup of sugar-cane juice, not on tank-bottoms as well as sirup of sugar-cane juice.

Mr. FIELD. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. POLAND. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion. I have an amendment or two more, which will complete this chapter, and which I would like to get in to-night.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] to an amendment proposed by him in line 900, page 602. I understand my colleague on the committee to propose an amendment which places the word "black" at the end of the word "drop." I call his attention to the fact that the articles enumerated in this schedule are enumerated in alphabetical order, strictly and carefully, and this will change the order adopted in that respect. I suggest now whether that amendment should not read "black, of bone or ivory drop."

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask that the question be put on my motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. If the amendment is not put in the form I have suggested, but retained in the form suggested by the committee, this section, instead of being put in line 900, should be put between 903 and 904, or, in other words, the word "black" should come between the word "blacking" and the word "bladder," to retain its order; for otherwise there would be confusion.

Mr. POLAND. I think the amendment would be in better form as suggested by my colleague, and save changing the order. It would preserve the alphabetical sequence, and I consent that it may be changed if nobody else objects.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio will state his amendment.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I move, in line 904. to strike out the comma after the word "black" and insert the word "of," so it will read "black of bone or ivory drop."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I withdraw my motion to reconsider.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on page 620, to strike out lines 274, 275, 276, 277, which are as follows:

Lastings, mohair cloth, silk, twist, or other manufactures of cloth, cut in strips or patterns of the size and shape for shoes, slippers, boots, bootees, and gaiters, not combined with India rubber.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on page 621, to strike out lines 292, 293, and 294, which are as follows:

Machinery suitable for the manufacture of flax and linen goods only, and imported for that purpose solely, but not including that which may be used for any other manufactures.

And on page 623, line 389, to insert after the word "gems" "statues and specimens of sculpture," so it will read:

Regalia and gems, statues and specimens of sculpture, where specially imported, in good faith, for the use of any society incorporated or established for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use or by the order of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in relation to one of these amendments to strike out in lines 292, 293, 294, "machinery, suitable for the manufacture of flax and linen goods only, and imported for that purpose solely, but not including that which may be used for any other manufacture," I propose to state precisely what we find to be the condition of the statute on that item. In 1861, in a tariff bill, this kind of machinery was put on the free list. In 1864, in another tariff act, they declared that kind of machinery might be allowed to come in one year duty free. But there is a clause in that bill repealing all former laws inconsistent with it. That was the only reference, even in general terms, to the statute of 1861. Before that year expired, in 1865, they passed another act providing that kind of machinery might be allowed to come in duty free for one year from the passage of that act.

That is the condition of the statutes as we find them. The committee regard this putting it on the free list in 1861 as virtually repealed by this law of 1864, which limited its freedom from duty to one year, with this clause repealing all former laws inconsistent with it. We therefore think it comes under the general class of machinery. There is no place where this is fixed eo nomine, but there are general provisions of duty on machinery embracing this. The opinion of the committee was that the construction of the statutes on this subject left this no longer upon the free list.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. There is a clerical correction to be made on page 620, line 253, by striking out the word "Indio" and inserting "India;" so it will read:

India or Malacca joints, not further manufactured than cut into suitable lengths for the manufactures into which they are intended to be converted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on page 620, in line 259, to strike out "irris," and insert "iris," so it will read: "Iris, orris root."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment to the free list:

On page 624, after line 427, insert: "Skins, dried, salted, or pickled."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 624, strike out line 434, as follows: "Specimens of natural history, mineralogy, and botany."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 625, after line 477, insert "weld" before "woad," so it will read: "Weld, woad, or pastel."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 625, in line 483, add to the word "painting" the letter "s," so it will read:

Works of art: Paintings, statuary, fountains, and other works of art, the production of American artists.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 625, in line 490, strike out "county or" after the word "State," so it will read:

Works of art: Paintings, statuary, fountains, and other works of art, imported expressly for presentation to national institutions, or to any State, or to any municipal corporation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 626, line 35, strike out "and the preceding," before the word "section," so it will read, "the provisions of this section," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 628, after section 2511, insert section 2494 from page 581.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 624, strike out "tiea" and insert "tica."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I believe this completes the work which the committee had proposed for to-night; and I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALBERT: The petition of Sophia Sparks, Julia C. Sparks, and Sallie Sparks, for compensation for articles furnished the Naval Academy at Annapolis, Maryland, by the late Dr. Edward Sparks, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ARCHER: The petition of Ann R. Voorhees, widow of Captain Philip F. Voorhees, United States Navy, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BECK: The petition of John Shubert, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of the Medical Society of Franklin County, Kentucky, for the passage of the bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts: The petition of Isaac Taylor, of Boston, Massachusetts, owner of the bark Alvarado, captured at sea by the United States sloop of war Jamestown, for the passage of a law conferring jurisdiction and authority upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine his equitable loss, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CLAYTON: Resolutions of the Legislature of California, in favor of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, resolutions of the Legislature of California, relative to the restoration to settlement and entry of lands granted the Stockton and Copperopolis Railroad, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. FARWELL: The petition of Lenora Marshall, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. HOLMAN: Papers relating to the position on the Navy Register of Commander Bushrod B. Taylor, United States Navy, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the petition of Captain James Roberts, of Madison, Indiana, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, papers relating to the claim of I. & O. P. Cobb & Co., of Aurora, Indiana, for boats and barges taken and destroyed, by order of General Boyle, on the Ohio River, in July, 1863, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LAWSON: The memorial of Reid R. Throckmorton, of New York, for reward and compensation for the invention of the tubular locomotive boiler, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of Buckman & Fogg, of New York City, contractors for carrying United States mails on route No. 6435, for increased compensation, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. LYNCH: The petition of Victoria L. Brewster, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MERRIAM: The petition of George W. Blunt, of New York, for indemnification for alleged infringement by the Hydrographic Bureau of the copyright of Rogers & Black's code of signals, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. RICE: The remonstrance of bankers of Chicago, Illinois, against any additional issue of paper money by the Government, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. SCUDDER, of New York: The petition of citizens of Huntington, Suffolk County, New York, that Frank M. Crossman may build at his own expense a breakwater in Cold Spring Harbor, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of coasting captains, vessel-owners, and others, of New York, for an appropriation for the erection of a light-house at the entrance of Cold Spring Harbor, Long Island, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SMITH, of Virginia: The petition of the heirs of E. O. Watkins, for compensation for property taken during the late war, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SPRAGUE: The petition of Peter M. Ward, of Pomeroy, Ohio, for correction of his military record, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WHEELER: Resolutions of the common council of the city of Buffalo, New York, asking an appropriation of the sum estimated by the Chief of Engineers for the prosecution of the harbor improvements in progress at Buffalo, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin: The petition of De Lorma Brooks, of Wisconsin, praying for an amendment of the Constitution which will dispense with the present judiciary system, and substitute therefor arbitration by persons chosen and paid by the parties litigant, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 19, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. FENTON. I move to dispense with the further reading of the Journal.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The Senate is too thin to attempt to do any business at present. I therefore think the reading of the Journal had better be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina objects.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the Journal.

Mr. ROBERTSON. As several Senators have just come in, I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further objection, the reading of the Journal will be dispensed with. The Chair hears none.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. No. 492) to make persons charged with crimes and offenses compent witnesses;

A bill (H. R. No. 933) to provide for the holding of terms of the district court of the United States for the western district of Missouri at Springfield, in said State;

A bill (H. R. No. 1592) limiting the time for prosecutions and convictions in certain criminal offenses;

A bill (H. R. No. 1593) relating to the punishment of the crime of manslaughter;

A bill (H. R. No. 1594) for the punishment of extortion by officers or persons acting under the authority of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2078) for the benefit of occupying claimants.

The bill (H. R. No. 2076) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue the use of the cutter Relief as a revenue-cutter, and use said vessel for a boarding station in Mobile Bay, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MARINE-HOSPITAL REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the resolution of the House of Representatives for printing the report of the supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service for the year 1873; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the Government Printer be instructed to print five thousand copies of the report of John W. Woodworth, supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service of the United States for the year 1873; fifteen hundred for the use of the Senate, and thirty-five hundred for the use of the House.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

NATIONAL SAVINGS-BANK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual statement of the National Savings-Bank of the District of Columbia, in accordance with section 8 of the special act of incorporation approved May 20, 1870, for the year ending December 31, 1873; which, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa; which was read:

Joint resolution relative to the amount due from the United States to the State of Iowa on account of lands conveyed to non-commissioned officers and privates in the Mexican war.

Whereas in the act admitting the State of Iowa into the Union, for and on account of certain considerations therein specified, Congress stipulated to pay to said State 5 per cent. on the sales of the public lands within the same, without any reservation or limitation whatever; and whereas a very large portion of said public lands has been disposed of under military warrants issued to non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates in the Mexican war, upon which the Department of the Interior has refused to pay the said 5 per cent.; and whereas, in the opinion of the members of this General Assembly, said claim is a just and equitable one, and should receive a favorable consideration and the sanction of Congress: Therefore,

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That Congress be, and the same is hereby, requested, by resolution or otherwise, to direct the General Land Office to take account of all the public lands within the State of Iowa which may have been disposed of under said military warrants, and to allow and pay 5 per cent. thereon, at an estimate of $1.25 per acre.

Resolved, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives requested to use their influence to secure a proper recognition and an equitable adjustment of said claim.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to forward a certified copy of these resolutions to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

JOHN H. GEAR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOSEPH DYSART,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 6, 1874.

C. C. CARPENTER.

STATE OF IOWA, ss:

I, Josiah T. Young, secretary of state of Iowa, do hereby certify the above and foregoing to be a full, true, and complete copy of the said original resolution, now on file in my office.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the State of Iowa. Done at the city of Des Moines this 14th day of February, A. D. 1874.

[SEAL.] JOSIAH T. YOUNG,
Secretary of State of Iowa.

I hereby certify that this joint resolution originated in the senate.

J. A. T. HULL, Secretary.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that that memorial be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and I desire to say that to-morrow or Monday morning I shall introduce a bill upon that subject, and I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate for five minutes while I explain it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SCOTT. I present the memorial of shipping merchants, business men, and other citizens of Philadelphia, protesting against the passage of the House bill leasing to Messrs. Dupont, of Wilmington, Delaware, the Old Lazaretto site, near Penrose Ferry Bridge, on the bank of the river Schuylkill, in the city of Philadelphia, for a powder magazine, setting forth the dangers to surrounding buildings and the effect it will have upon improvements in that neighborhood of the city. This memorial is signed by officers of three of the steamship lines of Philadelphia, and by a large number of the leading commercial and business men of that city. I believe the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I ask the reference of this petition to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

Mr. SCOTT. I noticed in the Associated Press dispatches in reference to one or two petitions on the same subject, that they were referred to the Committee on Commerce. If that be correct, I will ask to have the reference changed. I am not aware how it is on the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The other petitions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of John Barnard and others, of Chester County, Pennsylvania, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOGY presented a memorial of A. G. Neugent, agent of the State of Missouri, praying the passage of a bill to reimburse that State for expenses incurred in placing soldiers in the field during the war of the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

Joint resolution requesting the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State to vote for and use their influence in procuring an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so that United States Senators shall be elected by the people.

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State be requested to vote and use their influence to so amend the Constitution of the United States that United States Senators shall be chosen by the people of the several States, and not by the Legislatures thereof.
Approved February 6, 1874.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition signed by about 200 bankers, merchants, and other citizens of Chicago, Illinois. In looking over the list I find among them the names of many of the leading firms of the city of Chicago known to me by reputation. They respectfully represent that they view with alarm the propositions before Congress for increasing the volume of United States notes; that they believe that any additional issue of paper money by the Government would be most injurious to the interests of the nation; that the country is now suffering, and has been for the past twelve years, great loss and inconvenience arising from an irredeemable currency. Values of all kinds of merchandise and other property are continually fluctuating, owing to the constantly changing price of gold, and thus no certain calculations can be made in business. Speculations of all kinds are stimulated by an irredeemable currency, and the minds of the whole people are demoralized and rendered unfit for the pursuits of steady industry. They further represent that the resumption of specie payments at the earliest practicable time is imperatively required by the interests of the nation, and they most respectfully deprecate the issue of any more legal-tender notes, as such a proceeding would be understood as postponing indefinitely a return to a sound financial condition; and they further pray that the greenbacks already issued out of the so-called reserve shall be withdrawn again as speedily as possible. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not hear the names that were attached to that petition.

Mr. SHERMAN. The names of about two hundred bankers and merchants. I know some of them.

Mr. LOGAN. The petition has been in circulation for some time. I know the men who signed it, and I can only say that some of the gentlemen who signed it were the first men to close their doors and refuse to pay their depositors, and they did pay their depositors with all classes of paper that they had on hand. I do not speak of all of them; but some of the leading men who signed that paper have to-day in the hands of depositors paper of all classes, and closed their doors and refused to pay. Now they want specie payments. I do not speak of the majority of them, but I speak of some, for I have seen their names published in the papers. I desire to say now, in order that the Senator from Ohio and his committee may be satisfied in reference to the sentiment of my constituents in Chicago on this subject, that as soon as the time allows it to come here, I shall present a petition, without any speech accompanying it, showing what the sentiment of that portion of the country really is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented the petition of John H. Wall and other citizens of Lynn, Massachusetts, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HAMLIN presented a petition of ship-masters, ship-builders, and ship-owners of the town of Searsport, Maine, praying for an appropriation for the purpose of erecting the "Close fog-bell" signals along the coast of the United States wherever the shipping interests may require; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of the Methodist Episcopal church, of Phillipsburgh, New Jersey, signed by their pastor, Rev. William N. Searles, and other officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and other papers, relating to the bill (S. No. 411) for the relief of the Holy Cross Mission in the Territory of Dakota; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial numerously signed by citizens of Oregon, in which they represent that the entire people of Oregon and of the adjacent Territories are deeply interested in obtaining railway communication with the East; that the vast interior country between the Cascade Mountains and Salt Lake is without means of transportation, and that the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad is an enterprise calculated to assist greatly the wants of commerce, and to develop the country in natural resources; that the isolated condition of this entire region is a constant drawback to its growth and prosperity. They respectfully state that the bill introduced by myself, asking aid for this enterprise, is in the true interests of commerce and of territorial development; that the enterprise itself is entitled to take rank as a national work, and as such demands, as they think, the favorable attention of Congress. They therefore pray the passage of the bill. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of Jonathan S. Taylor, praying that he may be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. OGLESBY presented the petition of General Henry Raymond and Colonel Abraham Dally, of New York, asking that Congress so amend the laws as to allow a pension to all honorably discharged soldiers of the war of 1812, and to the widows of such soldiers, without regard to the time of marriage; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORDON presented the memorial of John Mabry, praying that he may be restored to the pension-rolls, and that a pension be paid him on account of services rendered in the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 482) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Willamette River, at Salem, in the State of Oregon, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 119) for the better security of property in patterns for metal castings, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 485) to grant an American register to the Canadian schooner George Warren, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 237) to change the name of the port of San Pedro, California, to Wilmington, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. No. 517) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to use the revenue-cutter Relief as a boarding station in Mobile Bay; which was read and passed to a second reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator from Michigan that a House bill on the same subject has just been referred to that committee this morning.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I will not ask action on this until the committee consider the House bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 474) for the relief of mail contractors for services rendered in the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas, prior to May 31, 1861, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 277) making an appropriation of $792.46, due the late James L. Day, of Connecticut, for transporting the mails over post-route 8152, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of certain mechanics and laborers employed by the Government on Dix Island, in the State of Maine, praying compensation for the two hours' additional labor performed by them each day over and above a lawful day's work previous to the 11th day of June, 1872, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of various citizens of West Virginia in behalf of William C. Parker, of that State, praying that he be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John P. McElray, late of Company D, Forty-ninth Regiment of Missouri Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. McCREERY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1922) to establish a reservation for certain Indians in the Territory of Montana, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 293) to establish a reservation for certain Indians in the Territory of Montana, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I beg leave to report, from the Joint Committee on the Library, the bill (S. No. 300) providing for a bust of the late Chief Justice Chase, to be placed in the room of the Supreme Court. The two Houses have already acted on that subject, and provided for such a bust. The committee therefore recommend that this bill be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of Rudolf Eickmeyer, praying the extension of a patent on sewing-machines for stitching linings into hats, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John W. Marsh, praying for the reissue of a patent on improvements in sewing-machines, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. DENNIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 406) to allow the schooner Ocean Wave to take the name of Edith E. Wright, and be registered under that name, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a petition of various citizens of Illinois, in behalf of Abram Hoevener, late of the Second Regiment Mississippi Volunteers, African descent, praying to be allowed the difference in pay between that of sergeant and second lieutenant, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Barnet Simonson, of New York, praying for a bounty-land warrant and pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Celia Tweed, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1222) for the relief of George W. Keyes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 517) for the relief of Sarah F. Lincoln, postmaster at Spencerport, Monroe County, New York, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF THE CHANNEL OF BUFFALO RIVER.

Mr. CONKLING. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report a brief House bill and to ask its present consideration, which I think will take but a moment. It can hardly be objected to; and if it is to be passed, time is very important.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1906) to dredge and protect the navigable channel at the mouth of the Buffalo River against the sand-bar formed by the gale of December, 1873.

The bill appropriates the sum of $20,000, to be expended by the Secretary of War for the purpose of dredging and protecting the navigable channel at the mouth of the Buffalo River, and of removing the sand-bar formed by the great gale of December last at that point.

Mr. CONKLING. It will be seen that the purpose is to anticipate, by $20,000, whatever appropriation may go to this harbor, owing to a very unusual casualty which happened in December from an almost unprecedented gale. I hold in my hand a communication from the Secretary of War, and one from the Chief of Engineers, showing the eminent necessity of this, which I will have read if any Senator desires.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to have it read, because it may be necessary to refer to it.

The Chief Clerk read the following letter:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, D. C., February 17, 1874.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the reference to this office for report of the letter of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate of the United States, of the 12th instant, inclosing H. R. bill 1906 and requesting information as to the necessity for an early appropriation for dredging, &c., at the mouth of Buffalo River, New York, and beg leave to reply, that from information recently received at this office it appears that there has accumulated at the head of the south United States pier at Buffalo about twenty thousand cubic yards of sand, which may seriously obstruct the channel unless removed by dredging. This deposit of sand has been caused mainly by the extraordinarily severe gale of December last, and the danger is imminent that when the ice in the lake breaks up and begins to scour along the shore of Lake Erie into the Niagara River, the larger part of this sand will be carried across the mouth of Buffalo River at the light-house pier-head. To prevent this, immediate relief by dredging should be provided for; otherwise the incoming fleet from the West will be compelled to seek refuge behind the outer breakwater and lighter before entering the harbor. It is believed that necessity exists for an appropriation in advance of the passage of the river and harbor act to remedy the evil referred to, and it is therefore recommended that H. R. bill 1906 be passed.

The letter of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce is herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General and Chief of Engineers.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP, Secretary of War.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COPYRIGHT AND PATENT CASES.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 494) amendatory of an act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to patents and copyrights, have directed me to report it back with an amendment, and, as amended, to ask for its present consideration. It is very brief.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The Committee on Patents reported the bill with an amendment, to make it read as follows:

That the provisions of section 55 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to patents and copyrights," approved July 8, 1870, shall be applicable to all suits and proceedings at law or in equity pending at the time of the passage of said act.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. The bill is to remedy an oversight in the repealing section of the general act of 1870. By the fifty-fifth section jurisdiction was given to the courts, after the decree of a permanent injunction in case of infringement of a patent, to assess the damages themselves. Prior to that time damages were assessed by a jury. It was intended that the alteration should apply in all such cases, whether pending at that time or not. But in the repealing clause of the act of 1870, substantially this phraseology is used: "The remedial provisions of this act shall apply to cases hereafter to be brought," or words to that effect; so that the intention of the fifty-fifth section is really not obtained in reference to cases then pending. The committee have therefore recommended the passage of this bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-ROUTES IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 493) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Arkansas, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage. I should like the Senate to consider the bill at once. It is a very short bill; and although the committee were careful in reporting the regular post-route bill, it is said in this instance that there may be a saving of $10,000 by taking off steamboat service from the Arkansas River and putting the mail on the route suggested in this bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish the Senator from Minnesota would withdraw his bill until to-morrow. I gave notice yesterday that I wanted to call up a bill to-day.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will make no objection to this bill. It is one that is made necessary from the construction of a railroad across the Arkansas River. It will save at least $10,000.

Mr. CAMERON. I will make no objection, as I want help myself to get up a bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to establish the following post-routes in Arkansas:

From Little Rock, via Argentine, Reed's Landing, Eagle Landing, Wampoo, Plum Bayou, Adamsburgh, and Pastoria, to Pine Bluff;

From Pine Bluff, via Carson, Rob Roy, New Gascony, Greenback, Cooper's Landing, Willamette, and Sarassa, to Arkansas Post;

From Watson's Station, on the Texas, Mississippi River and Northwestern Railroad, to Red Fork, on the Arkansas River; and

From Bath Station, on the Texas, Mississippi River and Northwestern Railroad, to South Bend, on the Arkansas River.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND DISTRICT IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 429) creating an additional land district in the Territory of New Mexico, have directed me to report the same back to the Senate without amendment, and recommend the passage of the bill. Inasmuch as there is some urgency for the present consideration of the bill, I ask that it be now put on its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides that all that portion of the Territory of New Mexico lying south of the principal base line of the Territory shall constitute a separate land district, to be called the La Mesilla land district, the office of which shall be located at such place in the district as the President of the United States may direct, which may be changed from time to time as the public interest may require.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF SUPERVISING SURGEON OF MARINE HOSPITALS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution to print five hundred additional copies of the report of the supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service of the United States, for the use of the Treasury Department, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That five hundred extra copies of the report of the supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service of the United States be printed for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island how many have already been ordered?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think there have been no extra copies of this document ordered. It only costs eighty-nine dollars and some odd cents to print this number.

The resolution was agreed to.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians, to report it back with an amendment, and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope there will be no new business entered on now during the morning hour.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I will give way to any morning business.

Mr. CAMERON. I gave notice yesterday that I would bring up at the end of the ordinary business of the morning hour to-day a certain bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania object?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Allow me to withdraw the presentation of the report until another time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is withdrawn for the present.

Mr. CAMERON. Now I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1394) in relation to the centennial exhibition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to taking up the bill indicated by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SARGENT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators in favor of the motion——

Mr. SUMNER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection was made to unanimous consent, and now the Chair is putting the question on the motion.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. WRIGHT. It will be remembered that when we closed the morning hour yesterday we had under consideration Senate bill No. 161; and I think that in a very short time we can dispose of that bill. I am opposed to taking up the bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania at present, for the reason just stated, that I think we ought to get through with the morning business; and in the next place I think the bill he suggests is of such importance that we ought not to take it up during the morning hour. I shall therefore antagonize the proposition with the bill I have referred to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that the Senate will depart from its usual order of business if it abandons an important and interesting question under debate yesterday at the close of the morning hour, in order to enter upon a discussion which must be extensive, and which we had better look at at once. It involves millions of money—millions of money to be considered in the morning hour, and millions of money to be thrust into debate, in order to shut out the interesting question that the Senate was considering yesterday.

Now, sir, I speak directly to the question of business; I do not go into the merits of either bill; but I submit to the Senate that we had better proceed with the business in hand, and especially that we should not displace it in order to take up a proposition which will require hours, if not days, of discussion, and which, as I have already stated, involves the appropriation of millions of money. I suppose the Senate is about ready to vote on the question of the commission to inquire into the traffic in alcoholic drinks; I doubt if there is to be much more debate on that question; but be the debate more or less, that question should be concluded before we enter upon another, at least during the morning hour; and then, as I have already suggested, not during the morning hour should we undertake to involve the country to the extent of somewhere from five to fifteen millions of dollars.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I am very much surprised to find an opposition to a simple measure such as I desire to bring forward coming from the Senator from Massachusetts, who is generally so liberal and so ready to second all measures for the honor and glory of the country. What he says in regard to the bill of yesterday is to some extent correct. I shall go with him in favor of that bill as far as he will go. In all matters relating to temperance, in all matters which go to the improvement of the morals of the people, I will go with the Senator as I have gone with him many a time, and perhaps, as I have done sometimes before, I will go ahead of him on such questions.

But I think it is unjust that he should state that the bill which I propose to bring up will involve millions. He has given a magnitude to the sum that under any circumstances can be required far, far above anything that anybody will expect the Government to do after this. He talks about fifteen millions, when the bill which I present here does not ask a cent—not one cent. It is only brought here to correct some errors in the State Department in relation to the centennial exhibition. Congress passed a law in 1871 directing that a centennial exhibition should be held in the city of Philadelphia for various good reasons given in the debate, and in 1872 passed another law incorporating a company and making the question a national one, not only giving the sanction of Congress to all that was done, but authorizing the persons appointed in that bill commissioners to invite contributions and persons from all parts of the world.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to remind the Senator that the merits of the bill cannot be debated on this motion to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. CAMERON. That is very true, and I thank the President for giving me the hint. But I am not on the merits now; when we get up the bill I shall show you what its merits are, if I can. Now, we only want it acted on immediately, because, as I was about saying, the commissioners gave invitations to different persons in different parts of the world and some of the invitations were accepted; among the rest an acceptance came from the German Empire from the hands of Bismarck himself, expressing great interest in the international exhibition and promising to be one of the powers that would be represented at it. Directly after that the Secretary of State, feeling that he might be too far committed in the measure, gave directions to our ministers and consuls abroad to say that he did not invite them, although he had already invited them by other acts. What a position did that put us in! People were invited to our house and were getting ready to come. Possibly you may have been sometimes circumstanced, Mr. President, as I have been, invited to a house and when you got there found there was no feast prepared. I have too much pride in my country to have such an act committed here in regard to a great measure in which we are all so much concerned. The reason I urge now the passage of the present bill is that we may have time to prepare. This is the beginning of 1874. In 1876 the exhibition must be in full operation, a little more than two years after this. I ask now that the Senate take up the bill and pass it, which has nothing in it except a matter of form. The bill is on the table of all the Senators, with a little pamphlet showing all the laws that have been passed. I ask the Clerk to read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill——

Mr. SUMNER. Is the bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. CAMERON. It may be read, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks to have it read for information.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas at various international exhibitions which have been held in foreign countries the United States have been represented, in pursuance of invitations given by the governments of those countries and accepted by our own Government: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be requested to extend, in the name of the United States, a respectful and cordial invitation to the governments of other nations to be represented and take part in the international exposition to be held at Philadelphia, under the auspices of the Government of the United States, in the year 1876.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I never object to or interfere with the private bill of any Senator on this floor; but if I am correctly informed the bill proposed to be taken up by the Senator from Pennsylvania during the morning hour is to become an entering wedge for an appropriation of from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States. When the act of 1871, to which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] referred, was passed, the seventh section of it provided—

That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act, from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same.

Section 8 provided—

That whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose, and for the exclusive control by the commission herein provided for of the proposed exhibition, the President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open and the place at which it will be held; and he shall communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of the same, together with such regulations as may be adopted by the commissioners, for publication in their respective countries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator that debate on the merits of this question is not in order at this time.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not propose to discuss the merits now. I was only stating the question as I understand it, and about stating some reasons why a bill of so much importance should not be taken up and disposed of during the morning hour, if that is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is undoubtedly in order to discuss whether the bill shall be taken up this morning or at some other time, but not the merits of the bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I again repeat, it is not my purpose to go at this time into a general discussion of this bill; but I simply desire to state to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] that if I comprehend this measure it will ultimately commit the Government of the United States to an appropriation of not less than five and which may reach ten million dollars to this centennial celebration. I think I speak advisedly. I think I can show that the reason for asking speedy action now by Congress is that this proposed centennial cannot go on unless Congress shall appropriate this amount of money; that the erection and completion of the buildings by private enterprise was to be a sine qua non to any invitation being extended by the President to foreign powers, and that all this was to be accomplished by corporate and individual subscription. Now I understand the fact to be that these buildings have not been erected, and I have reason to believe that they never will be built unless a large appropriation from Congress is obtained. This constitutes the necessity of the prompt passage of this bill to which the honorable Senator alludes. The object of the bill is to inaugurate a measure which shall commit Congress upon this subject—by which the faith of the Government shall be committed to a State and corporate undertaking. This is shown by the two acts which were passed on 3d March, 1871, and in June, 1872. I insist that this bill shall be examined and discussed before committing the Government to an implied obligation and future appropriation of certainly not less than five, and which may exceed ten, million dollars.

Although this present bill does not provide, as the Senator from Pennsylvania says, for the appropriation of a dollar, he will not deny that it contemplates the plighted faith of the Government for millions hereafter; it is the entering wedge to such an obligation, and I wish now to state to the Senator from Pennsylvania that if such be the purpose, it is better that both Congress and the country shall understand it. Why not ask frankly for that direct aid, stating its object? Why this indirect legislation? A deficiency of forty-odd millions of the annual revenue confronts us. The absolute necessity of a rigid economy to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government to prevent increased taxation is imposed upon Congress. We have been, as you know, obliged to cut down both the Army and Navy appropriations for the next fiscal year. In view of the condition of our finances, I insist the Senate should take no step which shall, without full discussion, commit the Government to any future appropriation of millions of money to what has hitherto been regarded as a corporate or State undertaking.

If the Congress of the United States shall hereafter determine to make this celebration wholly a national affair, and agree to appropriate the millions which shall be required to make it a national success, then it should go to the Committee on Appropriations. Such a measure cannot be——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must again remind the Senator that his remarks are addressed to the merits of this bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am not addressing myself to the merits; I am only attempting to show that this bill should not be taken up without a discussion which would extend beyond the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule provides that on a motion to take up any measure it shall not be in order to discuss its merits. On a motion to postpone one measure and take up another, while the rule as to debate on the merits of the measure to be taken up would be the same, the subject under consideration and which is to be postponed is always open to debate. But this motion is made simply to take up a measure. Now, if it were in order on one side to say that this bill shall be taken up because it is an excellent bill, and, on the other side, that it ought not to be taken up because it is a very bad bill, the rule would be of no avail whatever.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I said nothing about the merits of the measure proposed to be taken up by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have only opposed its present consideration. I said nothing as to whether after a full discussion I should vote for the bill or vote against it. I have been urging reasons why I thought this bill was too important to be taken up and considered during the morning hour. If I comprehend this bill, it is a quiet, unpretending measure, asking for no present appropriation from the Treasury, but still proposing to commit the Government to the cost of this celebration at Philadelphia in 1876, as under the auspices of the Government, for which the Government will be in honor bound to pay hereafter. The former acts contemplated no such object. The Government is not now, directly or indirectly, bound. This act is necessaryto create such a liability. Let it be discussed and considered.

Mr. CAMERON. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. CAMERON. There are just ten minutes now before the morning hour will expire, and I wish to correct an erroneous statement of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STEVENSON. I cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. CAMERON. I say I wish to correct the statement of the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must enforce its ruling that this debate is out of order. The only question before the Senate now is whether this bill shall be taken up now or at another time, and the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky and the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania go to the merits of the bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I was not going to make any remarks in favor of the bill, but to correct a misstatement, unintentional, of course, of the Senator from Kentucky. Section 8 of the act of 1871, the section just below that read by the Senator from Kentucky, provides—

That whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose, and for the exclusive control by the commission herein provided for of the proposed exhibition, the President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, &c.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania, in consequence of this section, have appropriated $1,000,000 and the city of Philadelphia $500,000 for the buildings. I only wish to correct that statement of the Senator. I know he would like to be correct about it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania what is the estimated cost of the buildings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair rules that such debate is out of order.

Mr. CAMERON. I cannot answer the question now, but I will when the bill comes up.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to make a suggestion to my colleague?

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Enough has transpired to show that this bill cannot be finally considered in the morning hour; and in view of the facts stated as to the importance of immediate or early consideration, may I suggest to my colleague that he use the residue of the morning hour in securing action on a motion to make the bill a special order, so that it may be taken up soon, at a time when we can dispose of it?

Mr. CAMERON. I have tried two or three times to make it a special order. Now I leave it to my colleague, and I shall be very glad if he shall succeed in getting a day fixed for its consideration, and I will assist him in doing so.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to have the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as to how soon the naval appropriation bill will be out of the way. I do not want to antagonize this measure unnecessarily, but it is certainly important that it be made a special order and be disposed of soon.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In reply to that I will say that of course it will depend upon the disposition of the financial measure now before the Senate. If that should be disposed of to-day, I should hope that the naval appropriation bill might be disposed of by the Senate as early as Monday next, perhaps.

Mr. SARGENT. If it is taken up at once.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it is taken up at once I do not anticipate that the bill will involve much debate or very great delay. I should hope that by Monday, or Tuesday at furthest, if we dispose of the financial bill to-day, we might get through with the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Then I move that the consideration of this bill be made the special order for Tuesday next.

Mr. SARGENT. Provided it does not conflict with the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. CAMERON. Say Wednesday or Thursday.

Mr. SCOTT. My colleague suggests Wednesday next.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to know what is to become of the finances. The financial question is under discussion now, and when is that to end?

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course the unfinished business will override a special order.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that; but why should we go forward and make a special order on this important question in the dark? I wish the financial question brought to a reasonable termination. Let us have our votes upon it. We have had only one vote. It strikes me that the Senator from Pennsylvania is interposing another important question right across the other and earlier question; and, unhappily, the question he proposes is to impose new burdens upon the national Treasury, when I cannot doubt it is our duty to watch it with care.

Mr. SCHURZ. The proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania is evidently to have this bill acted upon as soon as possible, and to make speedy action as certain as it can be made. Now, for my part, I do not mean to indicate how I shall vote upon this bill. It may involve a large appropriation of money, or it may not. The probability is that it will. At the same time it seems to me just to the people of Pennsylvania, or to those who have undertaken this great work, that this subject should be disposed of as soon as possible. If the Congress of the United States be willing to make such an appropriation, let it be done in time, so that the appropriation can be used to a good purpose. If the Congress of the United States be unwilling to make such an appropriation, let the people who have undertaken this great enterprise know it in time, so as not to run into further expense and further liabilities, which might greatly embarrass them. I think it is therefore but just to those who have undertaken a work which, after all, is patriotic, and which is designed to redound to the honor of this country, that they should be fairly dealt with by the Congress of the United States; and it seems to me that the first thing we should do, as soon at least as we can do it, is to let them know how we expect to act upon this particular question, whether we mean to give them money or whether we mean not to give them money, so that they at least may govern themselves accordingly. I therefore am heartily in favor of the motion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania on my left, [Mr. SCOTT,] and I hope the Senate may deem it wise to appoint as early a day as can be done without too much interfering with the great questions now before us and the business necessary to be transacted for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I was sadly misunderstood by Senators when they supposed that I was opposing this bill. I only opposed its being taken up in the morning hour. I have no objection to its being made a special order. I concur in what has fallen from the Senator from Missouri, that it is a question of too much importance to be disposed of in the morning hour. I desire that these gentlemen shall have a full hearing, and I am then willing to abide by what the sentiment of the Senate shall be. I only desire that the bill should not be taken up this morning, and I simply attempted to give the reasons that I thought were involved in the consideration of the bill as tending against the motion to take it up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves——

Mr. SUMNER. One word more, if the Chair pleases. I would not have it understood that I am acting except in the discharge of public duty, to secure the best interests of my country, its renown and glory, which I have at heart, and also the proper celebration of that great anniversary of the day which first saw republican government on earth. That day I would have nobly commemorated; but I do object to this hasty, premature attempt to press this subject upon the attention of the Senate during the morning hour, and I must also object to the effort to press it forward to the exclusion of important questions now on our Calendar. When those have been adequately discussed, and we have reached our conclusions upon them—one, two, three, four questions, perhaps, could be named of great importance—there will be a time for us to finish this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill in relation to national-bank circulation.

Mr. SCOTT. I hope we may have a vote on this question.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust the other business will be waived for a moment until we can take a vote on the motion of my colleague. I believe that everybody is now agreed that a day should be fixed for the consideration of this subject. I am glad to find that the Senator from Missouri has got into his old track.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the pending order be laid aside informally, for the purpose of proceeding with the centennial bill on the motion to make it a special order. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection if it creates no debate. I think it but fair to give the Senators from Pennsylvania a day in court, and therefore I hope we shall have a vote on the motion.

Mr. MORTON. I think there are special reasons why this bill should be acted upon one way or the other without delay. I know something about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that this bill be made the special order for Wednesday next. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2080) to provide for deducting any debt due the United States from any judgment recovered against the United States by such debtor;

A bill (H. R. No. 447) extending the time for the completion of the Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal, in the State of Michigan; and

A bill (H. R. No. 886) to provide for the election of Congressmen at large for the State of Alabama.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 438) to withhold from sale the site of the old Nyatt Point light-house; and

A bill (S. No. 269) to change the titles of certain naval officers, and for other purposes.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. CAMERON to the instructions moved by Mr. MERRIMON to the motion of Mr. BUCKINGHAM to recommit the bill, namely, to strike out all after the word "providing," in line 3 of the instructions, and insert:

That so much of section 22 of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and of the several acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, and such of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, and so much of such parts of any other act or acts of Congress as limit, or as may be construed to limit or restrict, the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under the said act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that hereafter all associations organized, or that may be organized, for carrying on the business of banking under the provisions of said act shall be free to establish and organize national banks with circulation at any place within the several States and Territories of the United States, upon the terms and conditions and subject to all the limitations and restrictions now provided by law, except the limitation upon the entire amount of circulation, which is hereby repealed.

Mr. MORTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COOPER. Is the pending proposition amendable?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I have a word of apology to offer. I have pretended all along, since the opening of this session, to be opposed to the increase of a paper irredeemable currency. I thought I was opposed to it really. Here is a proposition, however, to increase a paper currency irredeemable; and I am going for that proposition. I deprecate the necessity which has overtaken me; but it is here, and I must struggle with it the best way I can.

I was rather glad when in the morning of this debate I heard the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. SCHURZ,] and other Senators, talk about the evils of an irredeemable paper circulation, and talk about the evil of continuing to circulate among the people of the country the promises of the Government of the United States dishonored. I thought that was good sound morality, and I thought Senators meant it, wanted to prevent it, would if they could. Yesterday I thought I offered them a fair opportunity to guard against inflating or expanding an irredeemable currency. I asked, I invited, the Senate to vote for a proposition which would allow the holders of this deferred paper to give it up and take 5 per cent. bonds for it. A very large majority of the Senate said no, they would not agree to that. I have all along explained to the Senate the necessity I felt myself to be under to do something, if I could, to accommodate a financial necessity which I believed to be not general through the West and the South, but to be partial, to be real, to be urgent, to be honest. I have also spoken several times to the Senate of that exclusive feature of your present banking law, which I hold to be a great reproach to it, and which I want to get rid of. I do not see any possibility of getting rid of either of these evils but by accepting the proposition now submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania. That is accompanied by this one evil consequence, that it does inflate the currency. I have offered to support a proposition which would remove that feature. The Senate has rejected it, and I must take it raw, or not take it at all. I have concluded to take it, if I can get it. It will remove one great reproach from your statute; it will relieve some communities which have been urging for relief, and are entitled to it; it will avoid the necessity of making a raid on our friends in Rhode Island. I am always glad to be in Rhode Island in clam time. For the purposes proposed by the Senator from Ohio I would rather not go, considering that Rhode Island seems to regard such a visit very much as some of us regard the proposed visit of all mankind to Philadelphia in 1876; she is glad to see us, but does not want to pay anything—wants us to accommodate ourselves. It will avoid the necessity, I say, of making such an enforced visit as that; and so I am compelled to vote for this measure. But while I declare that to be my purpose now, I say I still hold myself ready on any day, in the Senate or out of the Senate, at any or at all times, to agree to any sensible measure which shall redeem the good faith of the Government, and which shall prevent an expansion of this irredeemable currency.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to detain the Senate a moment by way of discussion; but I wish to read an article in the last Inter-Ocean received here from Chicago, believing it to be the leading republican paper in the Northwest, merely in answer to what has been said, not expecting to convince anybody or to change any person's vote:

MONEY vs. CONSTITUENCIES.

"The New York business interests send word they hope to have by the middle of next week another memorial, representing at least $300,000,000, protesting not only against further inflation, but insisting that the already-disbursed portion of the so-called reserve may be called in."—Late Washington telegram.

We do not know exactly how many hundred million dollars the memorials from "the New York business interest" already before Congress represent. Nor is it important to us or to anybody else that we should know. Nor is it of the slightest consequence to Congress or to the country whether the New York memorialists represent $300,000,000 or $1,000,000, or no dollars at all. Memorials addressed to Congress on the subject of the currency, or on any other subject, are not to be estimated according to the magnitude of the bank accounts of the signers. The opinion of Jones to the effect that it is the duty of Congress to contract still further the volume of currency, or to prohibit still further issues, will have no weight whatever with honest law-makers, unless it is supported by reason and convincing arguments.

Petitions and protests merely serve to call attention to the fact that the people are divided and agitated on a given question. If a hundred thousand people petitioned Congress to do a certain thing, it should be borne in mind that there are still thirty-nine or forty millions of other people still unheard. The petition or remonstrance containing a hundred thousand names, therefore, is simply a notice to Congress that the subject-matter of the prayer deserves consideration. But the idea that the petition or remonstrance is to be estimated according to the amount of property represented, or pretended to be represented, by the signers is pernicious in the extreme. It is a blow at the principle of the equality before the law of citizens, one with another, whether rich or poor, which lies at the very foundation of our system of government. It is a proposition to rear on the ruins of the old slave oligarchy an oligarchy consisting of the moneyed aristocracy of the country. It is an attempt at a monstrous innovation, which cannot be tolerated for a moment. But if petitions in favor of contraction and remonstrances against an increase of the currency are to be poured in upon Congress, this method of procedure must be met in kind. Let the people of the West, rich and poor, merchants, mechanics, and laboring men, send to Congress petitions asking squarely for an increase of the currency as the sole means by which the varied industries of the country can be brought back from their present condition of helpless collapse to a state of active prosperity.

I merely read that to show the position of this paper.

Mr. SCHURZ. What paper is that?

Mr. LOGAN. The Inter-Ocean.

Mr. SCHURZ. So the Senator has been reading us a political artical from the Inter-Ocean.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; I said so.

Mr. SCHURZ. Now I will read to the Senate the financial article of the Inter-Ocean, probably of the same number:

SATURDAY EVENING, February 14——

Mr. LOGAN. The paper I read from is dated the 17th.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then I read from the Inter-Ocean of February 14, containing the financial report:

SATURDAY EVENING, February 14.—The week closes on a quiet and easy local money market, especially for parties who are able to present good collaterals. The movement of currency is decidedly in favor of this city, and bankers are enabled to readily accommodate their customers. Farmers have been liberal sellers of produce during the past month, and country bankers have materially increased their deposits, and in turn have forwarded them to the money centers for investment. This also has assisted the merchants to a great extent, as they have been able to make closer collections and request fewer favors of the banks. The ease in the New York money markets, and a more general disposition to refuse stocks as collaterals, has also turned money in favor of the West, and some of the city correspondents of the New York banks have had considerable money placed in their hands for the purpose of loaning on collaterals which can be turned quickly, and in which there is little probability of a sharp decline in prices. The principal demand is from grain and provision operators, and they are generally accommodated to the full extent of their requests. Lumber dealers are making some inquiries for loans at the opening of the season, but have not made any definite arrangements. On the street the inquiry for loans is moderate, and rates of interest are easier for good paper, though the majority of the offerings consist mainly of paper not in much favor with the banks. Real estate loans are obtainable at the legal rate of interest.

Here is the money article of the Inter-Ocean against its political.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I merely want to emphasize what the Senator has read in regard to the lumber-men. What he has read now verifies what I said yesterday.

Mr. SCHURZ. I beg your pardon. I stated yesterday, from the money article of the Chicago Tribune, that during this season the lumber trade has been very lively, and that about three times the amount had been shipped to the West that there was the year before.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. In regard to the ease of money and the possibility of making loans, the Senator took a certain ground yesterday.

Mr. SCHURZ. Perhaps the lumber-men were so fortunate as to operate upon a large scale without making loans.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I certainly have no right to complain of the position taken by my honorable friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] As a matter of course, he is the best judge of his own course in regard to voting on the various propositions that come up; but I think I have a right to complain that he should attribute his course in now voting for an unlimited sea of paper money to the fact that I could not vote for his proposition yesterday. He has certainly referred to it as an excuse for the course he thinks proper now to pursue. The reason I could not vote for the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin was because, while I am in favor of the general purport of it, I am decidedly opposed to his mode of canceling or contracting the volume of greenbacks. In my judgment it is not necessary. The mass of them can be maintained at par in gold without the necessity of contracting sharply, decidedly, in the mode proposed by him; and therefore, with all respect for his opinions, I could not vote for his proposition, as he must have known. I however had so much respect for him that I could not vote against it, and I sat quiet because the object of his proposition undoubtedly met my approval; but the provision of it that required the cancellation of greenbacks did not meet my approval, and therefore I did not vote for it.

Now, Mr. President, we are faced by a proposition, it is true far removed from the bill, to allow anybody who can command the bonds of the United States to issue notes of the United States to the amount of 90 per cent. of the bonds, without limit, without restriction, without redemption, without convertibility—an unlimited sea of paper money, with no proposition whatever to convert either these notes or the greenbacks into anything of value that will either produce income or property. It is simply to give the right to issue an unlimited amount of paper money, or limited only by the amount of bonds that may be purchased and by the amount of reserves required by law, and this in the face of propositions pending in both Houses of Congress to repeal the reserve, so that then there will be no limit except the amount of bonds.

I have no desire to comment on that proposition further. As a matter of course, if this amendment is adopted it opens up the whole sea of debate; it opens up the whole controversy again, and we shall have to go over it once more. I will not now offer any amendment to the pending proposition, simply because I should like to have the sense of the Senate tested. We have had a long debate already, and it is scarcely necessary to prolong it. If the Senate is now prepared to vote for this proposition and to instruct the Committee on Finance to report such a bill, undoubtedly the committee will obey its instructions, will follow the instructions literally, especially as the form of a bill is given and all the materials are given; but as to whether such a proposition as that can be adopted, whether it can be adopted now, each Senator will have to say—stand upon his own position representing his own constituents, and responsible to them and to the people of the United States.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, I should like to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania if there was connected with it anything which would restrain or curtail the issue of national-bank notes; and for the want of that I must vote against it; for if we adopt that measure I can see nothing but disaster to the entire business of this country—disaster which will result from an overflow of promises without any possible chance for redemption, until the community shall be overwhelmed with the idea that there is little or no value in them.

Suppose the honorable Senator was in debt—a very improper supposition, I agree; but suppose he was in debt, and he should give his checks upon a bank, and men should go and ask the bank to pay his check and they should be answered, "He has no money here;" and therefore the bank could not pay his checks. The holder of a check who received that answer first would know that the check was good, that the drawer of it was responsible, and therefore he would seek to pass it upon his neighbor, and his neighbor would take it, and take it why? Because he would know that the man who gave the check was able to pay. And so he might issue other checks, and other men would go to the bank and in the same way be refused, but by and by the number of checks would be so great that the men who held them would be unable to get for them money with which they could meet their own obligations, and therefore they would begin to decrease in value. Now let the honorable Senator increase his obligations by increasing the number of checks until he has flooded the neighborhood where he lives with them, and what would be the value of his checks? I think not unlike that would be the effect of this measure, and therefore I cannot vote for it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut is as well aware as other Senators upon this floor that the simple proposition before the Senate now is (and unamendable, I would remind the Senator) to break the present monopoly of banking; simply that and nothing more. In other words, if the banking privileges of to-day are desirable to any portion of the community, they should be open to all in harmony with the spirit of our institutions. I say that is a simple proposition submitted to the Senate, and it is one, I think, which will commend itself to the whole nation.

The Senator knows as well that if he desires to place restrictions upon this extension of privileges of the present banking system, he will have the opportunity after the vote has been taken. If this proposition to make banking free to all be carried, it will then be open to amendment, and such checks as the Senator may see fit to put upon it can be added; but at this stage of the proceeding there must be either a yea or nay vote upon the proposition whether banking shall be open to all or whether it shall be a monopoly for a few.

Now, sir, I am not disposed to consume time, for I did design to speak at length on the pending question; but I will content myself by merely stating that my preference is that the Government should issue all the circulation of the country, and under a general system of banking separate the issue from the discount. That is my choice. But surveying the condition of the nation in its industrial and commercial relations from a business point and with a practical mind, my belief is that the country demands immediate relief; and if we cannot get it under the form of greenbacks, let us have it under the form of national-bank notes, as the next best step attainable. With the right to organize banks when and where wanted, the freedom will compensate for some objections.

The Senator understands well that the national-bank currency is redeemable by greenbacks. Now, if I were to suggest—and if the chairman of the Committee on Finance will take it in the spirit in which it is tendered—it would be to provide for some sort of redemption of the greenbacks, by fixing a mode of conversion or redemption, and let the system of circulation become as free as air, to go wherever there is demand for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend will allow me to suggest that the Senate has already voted down a proposition to redeem the greenbacks either in coin or bonds.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. For the very reason that the Senate had not stated its judgment upon the question whether there shall be an increase of currency or not; and if there be not freedom granted then there is restriction in the proposition urged by the Senator. I can readily see how redemption or conversion into 5 per cent. bonds may contract the currency if there is not an outlet; but under freedom of circulation based upon the stocks of the Government, that indispensable security will serve as the brake to regulate the volume of circulation, and, controlled by business demands, there will be a wholesome check upon any unnecessary expansion of the currency.

Now let me remind the Senate of one fact. Senators talk about restriction, and we hear it stated by Senators from New England, who say that there is already so great a restriction upon the banking capital that capitalists will no longer invest under the present system. What is the restriction? First, you must pay 10 to 15 per cent. premium for your bonds; next, you must leave a margin of 10 per cent. with the Government as additional security for the redemption of the currency. There is 25 per cent., to which must be added a reserve of 15 per cent., making 40 per cent. idle capital, so that you have but 60 per cent. of your capital in the form of active circulation. Certainly that is an important restriction upon banking investments. That breaking up of capital will necessarily prove a wholesome check upon an overissue of currency.

Now, I ask any Senator who takes exception to the proposition now pending before the Senate this simple, practical question: If the bonds of the Government, based upon the credit of the United States, with the simple addition of interest that is to accrue by the lapse of time, are a sufficient redemption for your currency, upon what principle can it be denied that the same credit in like bonds as pledge for security will make the currency issued upon them safe and stable beyond the possibility of depreciation? I say possibility, because I cannot now conceive of any possible depreciation of United States bonds.

Allusion has been made to this method of expansion, and comparison made with other issues with no valuable foundation in fact. The superexcellence of our currency is well illustrated by this simple fact: in all other panics everybody who had a dollar of currency was glad to get rid of it; the object was to convert it into any other species of property. But when the last panic occurred it proved an exception to all other panics, whether under suspension or not, in this regard; every man who had a dollar of Government issue or of national-bank issue held it, and preferred it to any other kind of property.

If in the crucial test of a panic the people will thus act and hold the currency instead of converting it, and refusing even to convert it into coin at but 2 per cent. difference, (for your currency stood at 4 cents premium and your coin at 106,) what higher proof would you have that the people are satisfied with its value and safety? Now, I say, a system based upon the credit of the whole nation, restricted by the total bonds held by and within the control of the nation—and that is but a moiety of the bonds that are now outstanding—cannot be one of insecurity by any means. Suppose, at the worst, all of the $1,600,000,000 of bonds outstanding were held in this country and tendered for banking currency, the volume would not reach what it was in 1865 of all the forms then in circulation. We have thus tested without disaster a volume equal to the extreme maximum which I have suppositiously put.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. SCHURZ. I understand the Senator just now said that in 1865 the whole volume of our currency in all its forms was about $1,600,000,000.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. To state more precisely, $1,575,000,000.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator be kind enough to inform us what the current rates of interest then were?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Well, Mr. President, I thought that and the regulation of gold were settled pretty well and effectually in the judgment of all by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] When, as was stated, the price of coin went up, and interest ran up because the volume increased, it was caused solely, as was stated by the Senator from Illinois, by the doubt resting upon the ability of the nation to suppress the rebellion; and when gentlemen speak of the appreciation of our credit in the midst of the war, I tell them it was not simply because of any declaration of good faith on the part of Congress. I say to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, with due respect and without any disparagement of his eminent labors and ability, it was not so much his services in leading the Finance Committee and the Senate through the passage of acts to strengthen the public credit, but it was more the services of the other Sherman, marching to the sea, and Grant, tramping through the wilderness, that settled the doubt resting upon the integrity and solvency of the country; and they were the illustrious financiers who caused gold to tumble.

Mr. SCHURZ. I did not ask what the causes were of the decline of the premium on gold. I asked simply this question: Whether, when the volume of the currency amounted to about $1,500,000,000, that is to say, double what it is now—not during the war, while there was any doubt as to the stability of the Government, but after the war, when the victory was achieved, when the confidence of the people in the durability of our institutions was fully restored—I ask whether the doubling of the amount of our currency had the effect of reducing the rate of interest at that time to one-half?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am not disposed to evade the question, and I will answer the Senator in the language of my colleague, with whom I differ upon the currency question. I answer in his language when he said that during or succeeding the war, and up to within a very short period, the whole country was prospering. How? Because business was done upon a cash basis; there was less individual indebtedness during that time in consequence of the adequacy of currency. Individuals could get currency then to transact their own business or the business of corporations at lower rates of interest, and obtained it and paid as they went. That I deem the best answer to the question put by the Senator from Missouri. When the Government steps in and supplies abundant currency at a depreciation of 10 per cent., even taking that for granted, at the present rate of gold, it is far better than to force your circulation to a coin standard and compel an extended credit system to make up for deficiency of money. I would rather see money abundant so that business should be transacted upon a cash principle than keep the volume of curreney in the hands of a monopoly who shall dictate to individuals the amount of their lines of credit, and extort from them as a consequence higher rates of interest.

Mr. SCHURZ. If I do not annoy the Senator from Michigan——

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Not at all.

Mr. SCHURZ. He says that the answer he has given is a very clear and pertinent answer. I must say that if that answer was very clear, my understanding must be excessively dull. My question was this, and I repeat it: There was at that time what we call a generous abundance of money; there was just double the amount of what we have now, $1,500,000,000 of currency. The question I asked was whether that abundant amount of paper money had the effect of reducing the current rates of interest to one-half of what they are now. The Senator, instead of indulging in patriotic rhapsodies, which are very well in their way, but, I suggest, cannot solve problems of finance, might have answered me point-blank yes or no, so that I should know what I was about. For my part, I suspect that although the amount of currency in the country then was double what it is now the current rates of interest were at least fully as high as they are to-day, and probably a good deal higher.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The Senate is very well aware that the Senator from Missouri puts a hypothetical case. He does not state the rate of interest at one time, neither does he state it at another, and therefore I am left to the general principle for reply to his general question. If he wants me to draw the answer more narrowly, I will state to him another fact, which has come perhaps within his own observation. In the city of New York, during the months of the summer, when there is a redundancy of currency, the rates of interest are nominal; but in that same city, when there is a scarcity of currency, or when other seasons of the year occupy more of that currency in business channels, you find the rates of interest running up. If the Senator wants me to be more direct and practical than this, I will put my own observation and experience against his. I will state that, so far as I am concerned, in 1865 and 1866, during this increase of currency, this flood of currency, as it is called, I was able for myself and others to negotiate loans at from 2 to 4 per cent. less than I have been able to negotiate them within a month, and that is putting it moderately. That is a direct and specific answer, and the general one in relation to New York is another answer to what the Senator has put.

Mr. SCHURZ. I am sorry to trouble the Senator.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Not at all; I am not sorry to be troubled.

Mr. SCHURZ. But I would say that the record of finance tells a story a little different from that told by the Senator. He may, in his individual operations, have been very fortunate; but if he will look at the newspapers of that period he will find that during the corresponding months, when exactly the same condition of business prevailed that prevailed during the same months now, the rate of interest was not only as high but was usually higher than it is to-day, although the supply of money was, as he has himself admitted, just double what it is now.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I can only say that the Senator looks through different channels of business from what I do. He looks through professional eyes, and I look through business ones. That is the difference between us. He puts doubt upon fact, and I put fact upon doubt. There is where we stand; simply that, and nothing else. I state to him facts within my own knowledge that loans were negotiated in the years mentioned at lower rates than it is possible to negotiate them now. When there is a redundancy of currency bankers solicit debtors to take money, and modify interest rates; and in the other case the debtors seek for loans and are subject to lenders' terms.

Now, I desire to call attention to another check on this redundancy under this measure of free banking, and then I shall be through. If there is poverty in the land, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] if the great obstacle in the way of return to specie redemption is the poverty of the country or in localities, then there will be no capital to expand this currency. That will be a substantial and effectual check. Let it not be forgotten that not a dollar of this currency can be drawn out of the Treasury by the banks without placing there $1.10 or $1.15 for every ninety cents of currency. Every man who seeks to organize a bank must first have capital enough to buy the bonds, and when he has bought the bonds, he then gets 90 per cent. of currency upon those bonds. No man will enter into banking unless he is sure that there will be a demand for the currency after he has organized his bank. That is a great check. The poverty which is said to exist throughout the country, if it be so, is another essential check. Then in the way of security to the people the currency rests upon the bonds of the Government, for the payment of which the faith and honor of the country are pledged.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The Senator from Michigan objected to the position which I took, because that which he takes is so much better, designed as it is to break down this monopoly. I think I have expressed no other opinion since I have been here than that it was important to break up this monopoly and to make the system of banking free. To make the banking system free is to break down the monopoly. We then agree in the object; but to break down the monopoly by introducing that which is more disastrous to the public interests than the monopoly itself is not my purpose; and I verily believe that the flood of irredeemable currency which would flow over this country in consequence of a system of free banking, without redemption in anything which was of more value than the bank bills themselves, would be a vastly greater evil than that which pertains to this so-called monopoly. The Senator claims that we may yet incorporate in the measure the very restrictions which we suggest. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator if he is ready to vote that national-bank notes shall be redeemed in bonds? If so, that would be one restriction.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I will answer the Senator frankly, by stating that I am in favor of convertibility. I have advocated that since the fourth day of the session, and it is part of my plan. I will go with the Senator, so far as it shall be prudent in my judgment, to adopt some method of interconvertibility.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It is very surprising to me that a Senator on this floor is not willing to put two things together, when it is essential to put those two principles in the bill, where the one will counteract or balance the other, so as to make the system a perfect, practicable system. Mere expansion is not elasticity; it is all stretch in one direction. What we want is something which will bring back the currency or prevent too great an expansion. I should like to see something of that kind; I hope to see it, and yet I fear we shall not obtain it.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I feel bound to say a word in reply to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who seemed to think that I urged his vote last evening as my reason for voting for the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] That could not have been my argument, unless I very much misstated it. I certainly did not know how the Senator voted last evening on the proposition which I had the honor to offer. I simply knew that the Senate had voted against a proposition which I offered with a view of preventing expansion. That vote brings me to choose between the alternative of letting a want, which I have complained of frequently, go without redress and without relief, or of allowing it to be relieved in the manner proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I choose to support the measure now before the Senate. If inflation comes from it, it is not my fault. I repeat, because I see Senators smiling, if inflation comes from this measure it is not my fault, because the Senate might have guarded that possibility last night and may to-day, and also have relieved the Government from that reproach which many of them have hurled at it, of allowing its promises to go unredeemed, simply by consenting to pay its promises with a 5 per cent. bond. That they do not choose to do, for reasons doubtless satisfactory to them, very likely to be satisfactory to the country, but not at all satisfactory to me.

I think I have a right to say that the expansion which may be expected to follow upon the adoption of this measure is not so broad, so wide, so illimitable, as my honorable friend from Connecticut and others seem to think. If it were ever so broad, I should still go for it, holding those responsible for its effects who would not guard against those effects. I would go for it for the good there is in it, and holding others responsible for the ill that is in it. But it is not of that character. It will be guarded, as the Senator from Michigan has pointed out. Capital will be a little guarded in its investments. It always is. Nobody will be tempted by the freedom you offer to put money in the banking business unless he believes that there is an honest demand for capital to be employed in that way; and the judgment of capitalists exercised as to the wants of a particular locality can be relied upon a great deal more safely than our judgment as to whether the whole country has more or less circulation than it wants. I do not know of any financier capable of determining that question with accuracy; but I know of a great many gentlemen whose opinion as to whether more bank currency should be used in New York, or Chicago, or Green Bay, or Dubuque, would be very satisfactory to me, and I should rely upon it pretty confidently. No dollar will be invested in banking under your bill unless such capitalists, such business men, find some locality where they think it can be employed advantageously to themselves, because profitably to the community about them.

I know that this paper currency will be expanded somewhat. I know more money will be invested in banking when the Government gratuitously furnishes the banks a redeeming medium of $400,000,000 of mere promises, not money. More currency and more bank-notes will be put out than would be put out if capitalists were required to redeem every one of their notes on demand in coin. But that is because the inducement you are holding out is so great. That is what brings about that expansion. You can make that less if you will. In making it less, of course you guard against this danger. It is not the fault of the single proposition before you. It is not because of anything in the particular proposition before you that this danger is so strong; it is because of something that the Senate will not incorporate upon that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, the time is not auspicious for making any speech here; for the die is cast; the minds of Senators are made up. It is not my purpose to make a speech, but I wish to submit a few remarks on some points that seem to me worthy of a little further consideration before the final vote is taken.

Is it not strange, Mr. President, that since 1866 we should have had a new race of statesmen and philosophers born here to adorn our country? Up to 1866 there was no one here or elsewhere who repudiated the example and the doctrines of the earlier statesmen of our country as well as of the statesmen of other countries in relation to the great questions of finance; and yet we find here now arrayed on one side of this question Senators who utterly repudiate the idea of being bound by any precedents of the past. In 1866 there was a general unanimity in favor of approaching the resumption of specie payments at once. Now, we find in this Chamber Senators are perhaps nearly equally divided upon that question.

It seems to me that a great and material error is at the base of this division of opinions. The question here presented is now one of unlimited banking privileges anywhere and to anybody. It would seem, therefore, that Senators believe that currency, or so-called paper money, is the lever which is to produce wealth. Never was there a greater mistake. Wealth is only to be produced by labor and the products of labor. The merchandise and the commodities that any locality may have for sale will always command money, and that then becomes the evidence of wealth.

The original question that was brought in here by the Committee on Finance was simply a question relating to the distribution of $25,000,000 of circulation held by the Eastern States, among those that were deficient. The complaint was that the Comptroller of the Currency found that the law could not be carried into practical effect. The Committee on Finance brought in the bill here for the sole purpose of removing any obstacle to its going into immediate operation. When that bill came here it was met by the parties who were to derive the greatest benefit from it with opposition. It was said that it was not enough. In the language of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] it was declared to be "a half-way measure," or not even that. Now, sir, I desire to show that when that bill was passed the distinguished Senator from Indiana not only thought that it was more than "a half-way measure," but even more than he would himself require, perhaps. I thought I had the Globe, containing the remarks of the Senator from Indiana. I do not find them, but I can state them, for I read them this morning. It was then proposed to retire $45,000,000 of the 3 per cent. certificates, with an increase of bank circulation to the same extent; and a bill had passed the Senate for a redistribution of $30,000,000 of the banking currency held by the Eastern States; and the distinguished Senator from Indiana said at that time that if the other bill was passed and this bill also, it was perhaps more than he should require; certainly that it was enough. That bill passed, but it passed at $25,000,000—only $5,000,000 less—and the $54,000,000 bill also passed.

At first the Senator from Indiana was only for a trifling, a very moderate, increase of the amount of paper money; he was for pouring only a little water into the pump, in order to pump out more. That increase has been made to the extent of at least $27,000,000, issued by the Secretary of the Treasury. But now, the appetite having grown upon what it feeds, the Senator wants a great deal more; he wants, I suppose by his efforts here, going with those who go furthest, to have an indefinite amount of national-bank notes. As a leader on that subject, the Senator, I fear, has not been quite consistent. I propose to read his position in March, 1869, in relation to the redemption of greenbacks. There was a bill pending, and he referred to an act already passed, which contained this clause:

> Shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid.

The Senator from Indiana remarked upon that:

> Language cannot be broader, cannot be more comprehensive, than this; and this is a part of the contract between the Government and every purchaser of a bond created subsequent to that time, except where the creation of that bond is excepted from its operation, as it was in the ten-forty act. It is a part of the contract, although it is not contained in the same identical act of Congress that creates the bonds. It is the law, in full force and operation when all these bonds were sold, and is in force to-day.

The position of the Senator at that time was that the bonds of the United States could be paid in greenbacks. But he enforced that idea with his usual emphasis further:

> It is a mere quibble to say that because the right to pay the obligation in legal-tender notes does not exist in the act creating the bonds, therefore it is not applicable. If it is found in another law of the same date or of antecedent date, it is just as much a part of the contract, it is just as much a part of the right of the Government, as if it was contained in the act creating the obligation.

But what I more particularly desired to call the attention of the Senate to was his position in relation to a point which I have at heart now, as I had then, and that is the redemption of the United States notes in coin or its equivalent; and now I quote what the Senator from Indiana said March 11, 1869:

> Mr. President, this bill does contain one provision that I am glad of, and it is this: "And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin."
> Sir, that is worth all the rest. It will do more than all the rest to strengthen the public credit. Who can doubt it? And in view of this solemn pledge this Congress ought not to adjourn without making some provision for the purpose of redeeming the United States notes in coin according to the terms of this solemn promise; and when that is done, all the rest adjusts and settles itself.

That was good doctrine in 1869. I was happy then to follow the Senator, and I very much regret that he has changed his position.

Again, February 27, the Senator from Indiana said:

> This part of the bill—
> Referring to the part which I have already read—
> meets with my approval, I believe it is the first time that it has been proposed in Congress to declare that the greenbacks are to be paid in coin. Although logically there is nothing else in which a greenback can be paid, yet I believe it has never been thought or desired on the part of those who have been tinkering with the law upon this question to declare that the greenbacks were payable in coin.

I consider these doctrines uttered by the Senator at that time as sound. If they were sound then, they are sound now. We ought to have complied with that law before this time; and yet the measure before us puts off the day for an indefinite period. Who can tell when we are to resume specie payments, who can say when we are to pay United States notes in coin, when on yesterday the Senator voted against even redeeming them in United States bonds?

Mr. President, it seems to me that we are about to inflict a great evil upon the country, and especially upon the debtor class. What is the fact in relation to the debtor class? If gold is at 12 per cent. premium, we are making them pay interest on 12 per cent. more of principal than they would have to pay if they were on a specie-paying basis, and this just so long as a depreciated currency continues. I believe that we are inflicting a great evil upon the country, because upon looking over the whole country—and as statesmen we are bound to legislate for the whole country—it seems to me that this recent panic has badly affected the Senate, while it pervades only a small portion of the country. Take the Pacific coast. The whole Pacific coast are in favor of a resumption of specie payments. Take the East; there is little more than one voice there in relation to it. Take the South; there is no portion of our country that is so well able to support a specie currency as the cotton-growing States. Their product is not only large, but it always commands specie. Then if we regard the evidence of the boards of trade throughout the country, I know of but a single exception, and that a very mild one, that has not exhorted us to take some steps in relation to an approach to a resumption of specie payments. They are all against expansion.

If Senators who urge the inflation of the currency in order to increase business mean by that that we are to construct railroads, subsidized or not, where they are not needed, before they are wanted, they will find themselves very much mistaken. The credit of railroads built into regions containing no population and containing no business, has received a shock from which it will not recover for years; and no matter how plentifully you make money, you cannot induce capitalists to embark and subscribe for bonds or for stock in railroads in sections of the country where they will not pay dividends when built. Under such circumstances, it seems to me utterly futile to attempt to revive merely speculative business by issuing a further amount of the national-bank curency.

And now a single word in relation to the question of getting specie. It is a universal law of trade that gold will not circulate alongside of depreciated paper; otherwise wherever gold is wanted it will flow. It is impossible to prevent it; and if we were to take some steps, not now, of course, as early as the Senator from Indiana once proposed, July 1, 1871, for the resumption of specie payments, but at some future day not too remote, I have no question of the ability of the banks or of the United States Government to do it. Of course the United States Government would retire its legal-tender notes in bonds, and by the time those were retired the banks would be in full possession of all the gold they needed. Take the banks of the city of New York; with $26,000,000 circulation, they have $59,000,000 of legal-tender notes on hand, and over $30,000,000 of coin. Are they not in a condition for resumption? Of course they are.

But, Mr. President, I did not design to make a speech. I only desired to show, while I am proud to follow my friend from Indiana on many questions, that he was not infallible on the question of finance.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I do not profess to be infallible upon this or any other subject; and I will say frankly to my friend from Vermont that I have had occasion to change my views upon several questions in connection with it. I hope I learn something by experience, observation, and reflection. But, sir, upon the particular point to which my friend refers I happen to be entirely consistent with myself. I was in 1869 in favor of declaring that the United States notes were to be paid in gold; and I will tell my friend something, perhaps, that he does not know in regard to that provision of the act of 1869 to strengthen the public credit, from which he has just read:

> And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

I will say to my friend that I believe I am the author of that provision of that act, and I am just as much in favor of it now as I was then. In the first remarks that I made at this session of Congress, on the financial resolution introduced by the Senator from Ohio, I used these words:

> I agree that the faith of this Government is pledged to redeem what are called greenbacks in coin. I agree to that as fully and as strongly as anybody; and I further agree that we are to keep steadily in view what is called a return to specie payments; but the question is, whether it is our duty at this session of Congress, at this time, in the present condition of the country, to look to and adopt such measures; and at this point I differ with the committee.

At the time that act was passed we were in the heyday of prosperity; we had, perhaps, as good times as this country has ever had. I thought it was a good time then to take some step in that direction. I had previously brought forward a proposition myself to fix a day, some three years in advance, when the Government would begin the work of resumption, and I had proposed that the Government should do what was necessary in order to redeem those notes in coin, that it should begin to collect the gold for that purpose. I think my friend from Vermont then did not agree with me. Sir, the faith of the country was pledged from the beginning, and is pledged to-day, to redeem these notes in coin; but who is there now proposing to do it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will say to the Senator that I think he will find that I have never been opposed to a return to specie payments.

Mr. MORTON. Who is now proposing to redeem that pledge? My friend introduced a bill. Did he propose to redeem those notes in coin? Not a bit of it. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] introduced a bill. Did he propose to redeem those notes in coin? Not a bit of it. He proposed to redeem them in coin or in a bond, giving the Government the preference of paying in a bond, well knowing the Government had not the gold, and his bill made no provision for getting the gold, or even for keeping the surplus in the Treasury for that purpose.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator will remember that my bill proposed that the Government should issue bonds and obtain the gold to redeem the notes.

Mr. MORTON. That is the fact about my friend's bill. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] introduced a bill proposing to issue three hundred million or four hundred million bonds to buy gold to redeem the greenbacks. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] showed, at least, I thought, tolerably clearly, that that could not be done. I never believed that that thing was practicable. I had always supposed from the first—that was my idea in 1868—that the Government must collect the gold gradually until it got a quantity that would authorize it to say, "We will begin at a certain time to redeem our notes." My friend from New Jersey, I think, at that time did not agree with me about it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator from Indiana is in error as to the measure which I introduced. It was to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase gold, and to supply him with bonds not exceeding the amount of two hundred millions for that purpose.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly to purchase gold to redeem the notes, and that was the particular point that was answered by the Senator from Massachusetts, showing that that thing could not be done.

Now my friend from Vermont has referred to another thing. In 1868 and 1869 I did argue on this floor that the Government had the right to use the original legal-tender notes, issued before the bonds were issued, with which the bonds were bought from the Government at par, and which on their face declared that they were a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except for two things, interest on the bonds and duties on imports. I did argue that by the plainest and most direct provision of the law the Government had the right to use those same notes in the payment of those bonds. All the lawyers and all the courts arguing from now till doomsday, can never disprove the right of the Government to do it. But there was a vast interest against it, and no one took a more active part than my friend from Vermont in bringing about a different construction of the law. That was the great blunder of this Government, that has cost it hundreds of millions of dollars. But for that the greenbacks would be at par to-day, and would have been years ago. The Government dishonored its own promise; the Government violated the law of the creation of these greenbacks for a purpose; I will not say it was not patriotic, but it was as clear an infraction of the law as ever was made by a government or private individual. That is over and gone. By the act of 1869 that question was settled. I have never said a word about it since; it is too late now to refer to it; but I still insist that that was the greatest financial blunder ever committed by this Government. But let that pass, Mr. President.

Congress declined in good times, and when it seemed to me that the opportunity was fair, to make any provision for a return to specie payments; but just as soon as——

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me a word as to the point he has just spoken of?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator refers to the circumstances which gave rise to the act of 1869. I ask him whether, as a correlative proposition to that which relieved the bondholders from any fear that they might be paid in greenbacks, there was not incorporated in that act the specific pledge of the public faith that the greenbacks themselves should be, as soon as practicable, made equal to coin? I ask him whether those two propositions did not go hand in hand? I say to him, what I know to be a fact, that the proposition to require the Government to pay the bonds only in coin and not in greenbacks could never have passed Congress, in my judgment, but for the solemn pledge accompanying the same bill that the notes would be paid in coin at the earliest practicable period.

I will ask my friend another question: whether at the time we made this pledge, seeking to bring both bonds and notes to gold, it was not expected that in two or three years, at the utmost, the pledge would be redeemed?

Mr. MORTON. I think that was the expectation at that time. I then thought that could be done; but I believe there was no purpose, at least there was no fixed attempt on the part of my friend, the chairman of the committee, at that time, in that auspicious period, to bring about a return to specie payments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me correct the Senator. On the contrary, my friend will find that at the very next session of Congress I introduced a bill, and from that time to this have been every session day by day demanding that the Government should keep its promise to the noteholder, having fulfilled its obligations to the bondholder.

Mr. MORTON. What I have said is, that this session, upon the top of a panic, when our industries were greatly depressed, and a large portion of the people of the country suffering from the effect of the panic, was not the time to enter upon the resumption of specie payments.

One word in answer to this bugbear now about inflation. I think I am somewhat justified in calling it a bugbear. In the first place, we were told at the beginning of this discussion that the twenty-five millions provided for in this bill would not be taken in two years; that the premium on the bonds was such, and the condition of things in the West and South such, that twenty-five millions of circulation would not be taken in two years, and that long before it was taken there would be ample opportunity to make further provision for banking capital, if it were desired. Then we were told right on the heels of that, that New England had taken this excess, not because she wanted it, not because it was profitable, but because she was driven into it by the act of Congress taxing the State banks out of existence; and a bill was made to us by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] upon that ground, that it was not particularly profitable to New England; she did not care about it, but she had been driven into it. And then we were told by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] and the argument went all around here—I think my friend from Ohio himself used it—that national banking was not particularly profitable; that there was only about 1½ or perhaps 2 per cent. profit made on the circulation; that was no particular inducement to go into it; but when the proposition for free banking is brought forward, then the whole tide of argument turns in the other direction; then it is so profitable, there are such large inducements, that national banks will be established to the extent of the whole amount of the bonds available for that purpose.

Mr. President, that position, in my opinion, is unsound. If the other arguments were true, of course it is unsound. National banks will not be established except where it is believed they will be profitable, and where there is a local want for them. There are places in Indiana where there is not a bank within thirty miles now, with large population; there are places in Iowa, I presume, where there is not a bank in forty or fifty miles; and so in Missouri, and so in Illinois, and so in all these Western States. We have towns now of two or three thousand inhabitants without a bank, towns rapidly growing; and they cannot get banks. The States cannot give them to them; the General Government will not give them to them. Here are these local wants. We wish to supply them; but we are told that we shall not do it; that this is a cast-iron system, and must remain just as it is. That is what we are complaining about; and I will say to my friend from Ohio that these questions are entirely divisible. The question of distributing the benefits of the national banking system is a thing entirely separate and apart from the question of the resumption of specie payments. If you resume specie payments to-morrow we still ought to have the means of equalizing the benefits of this national banking system; and every community in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, or elsewhere that has now come to the point that they want a bank ought to have some means of getting it. Now they have not; and my friend's bill refuses to supply them. As I had occasion to say before, of the twenty-five millions not a dollar will go to a single Northwestern State.

Mr. President, as was said last night by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] as you increase the number of banks you increase the demand for legal-tender notes. As the law now stands they must have 15 per cent. of reserve on their circulation for country banks and 15 per cent. on their deposits, which will make an average of from 25 to 30 per cent. I suppose—I have not looked at the figures—there are now $100,000,000 of greenbacks in the vaults of the banks held as reserve.

Mr. ALLISON. One hundred and ten million dollars by the report of the Comptroller.

Mr. MORTON. My friend from Iowa says $110,000,000; therefore of the volume of greenbacks, now some $375,000,000, $110,000,000 are held in the vaults of the banks out of circulation, because they are held as a reserve. As you increase the number of banks you increase the difficulty of getting these reserves. You make a new demand for greenbacks. You do not cheapen the greenbacks, but you increase their value, because you create a new demand for them. You do not increase the number of promises that the Government is pledged to redeem in coin. The Government is pledged, we will say, to redeem these notes in coin; you do not increase that difficulty at all, but you contribute to bring up the value of these notes as you increase the demand for them; and thus you diminish the difference between their value and the value of coin.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from Indiana will perhaps permit me to ask him a question—not a question put for the purpose of interfering with his argument, but purely to get some information from him. He tells us that the organization of national banks in addition to the number of national banks we have now, and the issue of currency over and above the amount now outstanding, and perhaps over and above the amount of greenbacks out, will have the effect of appreciating the greenbacks. That is the way I understand him; because the greenbacks are needed as a reserve. Am I correct?

Mr. MORTON. That was my argument, undoubtedly.

Mr. SCHURZ. Now, I should like to know whether, in the Senator's opinion, if we should carry the issue of national-bank notes say to about $800,000,000, to double the amount of greenbacks outstanding, the appreciation of greenbacks would be so great as to create a difference in the current value of greenbacks and national-bank notes? I assure the Senator from Indiana that this question is put in perfect good faith, and not to lead him into a snare.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to my friend that if the amount of national-bank notes was increased to $800,000,000, in my opinion it would lead to the winding up of the national banks, because they could not, without too much expense, procure the notes in which they were bound to redeem theirs; because whenever you get the amount of national-bank notes to any considerable extent above the volume outstanding of legal-tender notes, there will become a difference in value such as to make it profitable to run the national-bank notes home and get the legal-tenders in place of them; and that of itself will prevent the extension of the banking system, as a matter of course.

Mr. SCHURZ. Now, if I understand the opinion of the Senator it is this: that as soon as the volume of the national-bank notes issued exceeds the number of greenbacks in circulation, then the greenbacks will appreciate in proportion to the national-bank notes. In other words, that the current value of greenbacks will be greater than that of national-bank notes. Is that it; and that therefore, in issuing national-bank notes redeemable in greenbacks, we have to confine ourselves strictly to the number of greenbacks out? Is that the Senator's opinion?

Mr. MORTON. I did not say "strictly." I did not say dollar for dollar.

Mr. SCHURZ. Say materially, virtually.

Mr. MORTON. What I said was, that whenever the volume of national-bank notes exceeded to any considerable degree the volume of legal-tenders, the difficulty of procuring legal-tenders as reserves and for the purpose of redeeming the bank-notes would be enough to make it profitable for brokers to speculate in legal-tender notes, and that that would be an effectual prohibition to the further extension of the national banking system. We have experience which shows us that in regard to banks of another character——

Mr. SCHURZ. If I may continue this conversation, which I hope the Senator from Indiana considers as pleasant as I do myself, then if there were, say, some $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 of national-bank notes out, to prevent the difficulties which necessarily would arise by the disproportion between greenbacks and national-bank notes, and in order to restore the necessary equilibrium, it would render necessary the emission of a further amount of greenbacks in order to keep afloat the national-bank circulation. Would not that be it? Or it would necessitate the withdrawal of the national-bank circulation in excess of the amount of greenbacks out. Is not that about it?

Mr. MORTON. What does the Senator mean when he says "is not that about it?" It would require an act of Congress to do it, undoubtedly.

Mr. SCHURZ. Precisely the question I put to the Senator is this: Whether this proposition is correct in his opinion?

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, as long as Congress limits the number of greenbacks to be issued—a thing that Congress may perhaps trust itself with—that of itself necessarily fixes a limitation to the extension of the national banking system, so that its issues cannot go far beyond the volume of the greenbacks. I do not believe myself that it would extend more than forty, fifty, sixty, or seventy millions. Certainly I do not believe it would go to the extent of one hundred millions. I do not think the demands of the country now require a greater increase of the currency than that.

Mr. SCHURZ. Will the Senator permit me another question?

Mr. MORTON. Yes.

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator believes that it will go farther than that, why not fix the limit? But leaving that aside, there was another question I wanted to ask the Senator. Is it the opinion of the Senator that an increase of the national-bank circulation would have the effect of raising the premium on gold—I mean a considerable increase, the greenback circulation remaining the same?

Mr. MORTON. I think not at all. An increase of the greenback circulation to any considerable extent perhaps would; but an increase of national-bank notes to be redeemed in greenbacks, while the volume of greenbacks is held steady, certainly would not increase the premium on gold. I think it would have the other effect, by increasing the demand for greenbacks, and making them thus that much more valuable; and that brings me to a thought which I may as well express now. I believe the emission of twenty-seven millions of legal-tender notes by the Secretary of the Treasury since the panic has not had an appreciable effect in increasing the premium on gold. It has relieved the condition of the country. Some of my friends here are not willing to admit the extent of that relief; but I think that is one of the most beneficial things that have been done by this Government. I approve it; I indorse it wholly; and I call the attention of my friend from Vermont to the fact that when we provided for the issue of fifty-four millions of national-bank notes in 1870, that did not increase the premium on gold then; but, on the contrary, the premium on gold declined. Nor do I believe that the issue of forty, fifty, or seventy-five millions of national-bank notes can have any effect upon the premium on gold, except to reduce it by increasing the demand for greenbacks.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator says that the effect of the emission of about twenty-five millions of greenbacks has not been to increase the premium on gold. Why, one thing is certain—that gold has gone up, since the day it reached its lowest point, about 6 per cent. I think it is now about 12⅝.

Mr. ALLISON. It was 11 the day before the panic.

Mr. MORTON. And two or three months before the panic it was 18. In the early part of last spring I think it was 18.

Mr. SCHURZ. It was 18 in April.

Mr. MORTON. So far as the price of gold is concerned, I will say to my friend that during the panic there was no market for gold. People did not want it. You could not sell gold in the market; you could not even borrow greenbacks with it. The demand then was for greenbacks; the demand was for currency; and so far from the panic depreciating our currency—and that shows the soundness of it—the value of the currency was increased by the panic and there was no market for gold at all, and gold was sold as low as 7 per cent. because there was no demand for it. And yet we hear the currency constantly slandered as the great curse of the country. In the time of a panic, and a bad panic, the premium on gold goes down and the value of currency appreciates; and yet we are told that is an argument showing the immediate necessity of returning to specie payments. It only calls me back to a position that I made in answer to my friend some time ago on this floor, that the effect of panics was not to demand gold, but it was to demand the suspension of the payment of gold by the banks, which has very nearly always been the case.

Mr. SCHURZ. I may remind my friend from Indiana of the answer that I gave to him, that since suspension is such a perfect remedy for panics, it is perfectly astonishing how, having been in a suspended condition for the last eleven years, and the remedy having been applied without intermission during that period, we could have had a panic at all after the medicine was administered to us long before the disease broke out.

Mr. MORTON. That is only an answer in phraseology. It is not an answer in substance at all. I never said that suspension would prevent all panics. I did argue, and I proved it too, that specie payments did not prevent panics; that in point of fact, to come right down to the naked history, there had been more panics under specie payments than there had been under other circumstances, and that the worst panics which had occurred in England and in this country were when the banks were paying specie, and there was no suspicion of their unsoundness either; so that my friend's answer was an answer in words and not in substance. My friend understands very well the force of language, and how to make an apparent metaphysical point when there is nothing absolutely in what he says; and I say that in all kindness.

Mr. SCHURZ. Now, I think I cannot let this provocation go unanswered. I thank the Senator for his compliment, but I think there was a little more in my answer than mere language. The Senator has been arguing before us all the time that a condition of specie payments is such as is most apt to bring about panics. He has been arguing also that a suspension of specie payments is the best remedy that can be invented for panics. Now, when this last panic broke out, we were not in a condition of specie payments, as the Senator is well aware, but for eleven years we had been under suspension; and yet, as I expressed it, although the medicine had been applied constantly for eleven years, it did not prevent the breaking out of the disease.

Mr. MORTON. I said all that myself. I said suspension was not an infallible remedy against panics.

Mr. SCHURZ. Then we are better agreed than before.

Mr. MORTON. We do not disagree in substance, when my friend comes down to it, because he cannot controvert, and he has not controverted, the soundness of the positions I took in the first argument that I made upon this subject. So far as the play of words is concerned, I always yield the palm to my friend.

But, Mr. President, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate; I simply want to say that there are two questions before the country. The first is the question of resumption. I said in the beginning of this session that I hardly thought this was the time to consider that question; at least I did not think it was an auspicious time. I said in the speech I have before me, made on the 20th of December, that if we provided for resumption at this session of Congress, we ought to put it off so long that it would not alarm the country, and would not embarrass the commerce, the trade, and the industries of the country. That is what I said then. But there is another question upon us now, that has been growing for years past and is growing to-day; and that is the demand in many parts of this country for bank facilities that are now absolutely withheld from them. You cannot make one of these questions an excuse for not answering the other. The proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania now is to answer the one, to provide by free banking for giving to every part of the country facilities, if they want them and are prepared to take them. That is a separate and distinct question from the other. But when we come to that, we have the other thrust in our face and presented as a reason why no action should be taken in this direction, and we are told that things must remain just as they are until we get to specie payments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I now have the passage in the Globe before me that I referred to when I was up before.

Mr. SCHURZ. Allow me to ask the Senator from Vermont to yield to me a moment. I wish to say one word in reference to the last statement of the Senator from Indiana. He says that we are insisting, with regard to the extension of banking facilities, that things must remain just as they are until we return to specie payments. Now, it is very well known on this floor that we are not insisting upon anything of the kind. On the contrary, it has been advocated on our side all the time while this bill has been before the Senate to take away a certain amount of circulation from the New England States and distribute it in the West and South. The Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, proposed in his bill twenty-five millions; an amendment was introduced raising that amount to fifty millions. So it cannot be said that we have been insisting upon letting things remain just as they are.

Mr. MORTON. My answer to my friend is just this, that the redistribution of twenty-five millions will leave at least twelve States entirely untouched. They would not get one cent from it, and so far as those States are concerned the bill does insist, in substance, that things shall remain as they are; and some of those twelve States are among the most prosperous and growing States in the Union, whose wants are rapidly increasing.

Mr. SCHURZ. Well, sir, there is an amendment before the Senate increasing the amount to fifty millions, and the Senator has been telling us just now in his speech that he does not believe that the increase of national-bank currency, in consequence of the passage of a free-banking act, will exceed forty or fifty million dollars.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. When I was addressing the Senate a few moments ago I referred to a passage in a speech of the Senator from Indiana in 1870, wherein he seemed to be content with a much less figure than he is now as to this twenty-five million distribution. On the 25th of January, 1870, I find these words. After alluding to the bill for $30,000,000 to be taken from the Eastern States and distributed, he said:

> If this is to be a substitute for the other bill, then it does not go far enough. If it is intended as supplemental to the other bill, and the amount of $45,000,000 is fixed under the expectation that the other bill is to be passed in the House, then it does go, perhaps, far enough, and perhaps further than some might insist upon going.

Not only that bill for $45,000,000, but in compliance with the argument of the Senator from Indiana that it ought to be made $9,000,000 more in order to offset for the reserve, we did pass a bill of $54,000,000, and that has been all issued as I understand; and, in addition to that, the $25,000,000 bill for distribution was passed. The latter not being practically operative, we brought in a bill at this session to make it operative, and in addition to all that, $27,000,000 more of the so-called reserve have been issued by the Treasury Department. And in the same speech already mentioned the Senator said this:

> While I have been steadily opposed to the expansion of the currency ever since I have had the honor to be a member of this body, I have always been opposed to contraction, and I think the sense of Congress has been expressed time and again within the last three years against the contraction of the currency.

Now, Mr. President, after having conceded all that the Senator asked in 1870, and after declaring his opposition to expansion, the Senator to-day is even more eager and cries, "Give, give," all the time for more currency. The Senator is mistaken in supposing that the question of distribution would be left open after a resumption of specie payments. Upon a resumption of specie payments there would be no objection in any part of the country to free banking, and, of course, that question would not be still left open. It would settle and adjust the question at once.

The Senator made a remark in relation to the issue of the fifty-four millions, that it did not at that time increase the premium on gold; and why? Let me answer. Because that issue was a substitute for the 3 per cent. certificates then used as a part of the reserves of the banks, and answering all the purposes of currency.

The Senator from Indiana is a gentleman whose views are so important to the country that he is interviewed, and I find that a correspondent of the New York Herald interviewed him November 30, 1868, and here is what is reported of that interview:

> I have been misrepresented as to my exact views, but I shall be happy to give you a correct understanding of them. I propose to return to specie payments, and contemplate fixing the time by law, say the 1st of January or July, 1871, for beginning the redemption of the greenback currency; and this for several reasons. I am opposed to further contraction until redemption begins.

Then, as a further illustration of the Senator's position, he wrote a letter to the New York World of the same date, November 30, 1868, in explanation of his financial views, and he said:

> What I urged during the canvass was that the first duty of the Government was to return to specie payments, which, when accomplished, would settle all questions as to the payment of the bonds.

I only bring up these records to show that the Senator from Indiana is always earnest in urging and promulgating his views, and that if he is urgent to-day, he was no less urgent six years ago. It seems to me, with my limited comprehension, that there is somewhat of a difference between his position to-day and that of six years ago, although he assures us that there is not; and of course I am bound to believe him, and not the record. I take it that he is, like my friend from Pennsylvania, utterly opposed to any inflation, but he wants a further supply. And hereafter, when anybody is found in a state of inflation from having taken a little too much of the ardent, it will not be said that he is inflated; only that he has a good supply. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I am especially gratified by the remarks of my friend from Vermont. He has paid me a very high compliment. He has shown that he thinks my record is of sufficient importance for him to keep well posted in it, and he has also shown that he is a diligent reader of the New York Herald and of the New York World, and that he keeps files of those newspapers to which he can refer on occasion. I want to say to my friend as to that interview, although I have no recollection about it now, I think the statement of it is correct, because the reporters of the New York Herald very seldom make mistakes on such subjects; but at the date of that interview in 1868 the time was much more auspicious for returning to specie payments, or at least for taking the first step, than it is now. Then there was no panic upon the country; there were universal good times, and the utmost confidence was prevailing everywhere. I proposed to fix the time some three years in advance, and that the Government should collect the gold, not by selling bonds as it is proposed to do now, but that the Government, instead of selling gold in the market from time to time, should keep its gold until it had on hand a quantity that would authorize it to say to the country, "We are prepared to begin the redemption of our notes in coin." I always thought that that was the sensible way. But gentlemen have now found out a patent way for returning to specie payments. My friend from Ohio has discovered that the way to redeem the notes in coin is to redeem them in bonds by another promise to pay. There is a great thirst for bonds. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] proposes to issue bonds; my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] proposes to issue bonds. It all looks in the direction of an increase of the bonded debt of the country. That they seem to regard as the great panacea of our ills, to resume specie payments by paying in bonds.

Now, one word in regard to the extract read from my speech in 1870. What was the proposition at that time? It was to equalize the distribution then by taking $25,000,000 from the East and adding it to the $54,000,000 of new notes, making $79,000,000. That was thought to be necessary in 1870, fully four years ago. In 1870 it was thought that that would perhaps equalize the currency sufficiently at that time; but that was not carried out, and now four years have elapsed of unprecedented growth, and a number of States have added millions to their population and millions to their wealth, and yet we are told that we must be held to this estimate fixed in 1870, when it is notoriously inadequate.

I say again these two questions are artfully confounded all the time. The question of resumption and the question of equalizing the benefit of the national banking system are artfully confounded. They have no necessary connection with each other. Let us take one at a time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. He says now that he desires to equalize the currency. If the Senator desires to equalize the currency, why not take the bill reported by the committee, and that is still the text of this whole debate? Increase the amount named in it if you will, and I have no doubt the majority will probably vote with him on that point; but pass the bill and it will equalize the currency.

Mr. MORTON. What bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill for the $25,000,000 redistribution; increase the amount if you will. The proposition now pending adds to the inequality. The statement made by the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] yesterday is true. The New England States, probably two of them, Rhode Island and Massachusetts, will take more bank stock under this measure, threefold, than all the cotton States combined; and the State of New York and the Eastern States that already have a surplus will take more bank stock under this system of free banking as now proposed than all the West and South combined. So that the Senator adds to the inequality, and he makes this local complaint only more grievous.

If the Senator really wants to carry out the idea he now puts forward, if he wants to equalize the currency, he can do it by passing the original bill. The Senator from Maine said that he for one would rather you would take the whole bank circulation from his region of country, make the equalization go to the full extent of the $80,000,000 of which certain States have an excess, than to vote for this increase of paper money. No, sir, the idea is not to equalize the currency; that is not the object of this proposition. If that is what you want, the way is plain and simple before you; all you have to do is to go back to the original bill, and pass a bill that will equalize the currency; withdraw from the States that have an excess and give to the South and West as much as they want, and as fast as they want it. That is not the purpose of this measure. That is not the purpose of the Senator from Indiana and his friends. If it is, there is a plain and easy way to do it. They have the power now to equalize the currency if they want to do it. A bill is pending that will provide all they want for two years; and if that is not enough, take more, take the whole amount of excess; and that surely equalizes the currency. But that is not the proposition.

My friend cannot now say that all this movement to inflate the currency is merely to equalize the currency. Those who vote for the pending proposition desire to kill and defeat the bill for equalizing the currency. Sir, I intend now and hereafter to show that this attempt to make a local grievance the ground of a national calamity is entirely unjustifiable. You have it in your power, I tell my friend from Indiana, now to equalize the currency on the basis of existing laws, not only to the amount of twenty-five millions, but to the amount of seventy-five millions. When you have the power to do that, you come forward and say, "No; we will not exercise this power; we will authorize New England to issue more paper money, New York to issue more paper money, the West and the South to issue more, with no limit or restraint." Sir, it is idle for these gentlemen to talk to us about equalizing bank currency. That is what we desired to do; that is what we sought to do. We sought to go as far as there was occasion, to go to the extent of twenty-five millions; but the very proposition made by us to equalize the currency is made the basis of an inflation of the currency.

Why, sir, let me say to Senators now in all seriousness that this proposition to invite all the capitalists of this country to put their money into bonds of the United States, and with those bonds to get an almost equal amount of paper money, is to invite from all the industrial interests of the country great masses of capital and put it where it can duplicate its power, receive interest on its original amount and interest on as much more paper money. But it is said that capitalists will not do it, that they will not buy bonds. Let me tell you, Senators, they will buy bonds; or rather those who have the bonds will get the benefit of this circulation, and those who have not got the bonds will only have to pay a higher price for them.

This measure is deceptive to the West and South for a double reason. This proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, without the redemption, will add to the value of the bonds, will depreciate the value of your greenbacks; and then when greenbacks are to be used for the purchase of bonds you will have to pay a higher price for the bonds. Thus the bondholders, the capitalists, will get an increased price for their bonds if they are sold at all; but they can take those bonds and deposit them safely in the Treasury of the United States without risk, without danger, without redemption, without fear that they will be taken or impaired, and then they can draw out of the Treasury of the United States the notes of the United States, for which the United States are bound, to the amount of 90 per cent. of their bonds, and when they have received those notes they can loan them at 10 per cent. to the people of the South and West. Yes, sir; the bondholder now in possession of a bond of the United States may take his bond and file it with the Treasury, put it in the custody of the Treasury of the United States, draw his interest regularly, quarterly according to law, receive all the interest that the Government agreed to pay him in gold, and then he may receive 90 per cent. of that bond in circulation, and issue that and loan it at 5, 6, 7, 8, 10, or 20 per cent. to the people of the West and South. How long will such a system of inflation exist?

I tell Senators that the passage of this measure, as now offered, unless you add to it some provision for the redemption of these notes, is the death-knell of the national banks. As sure as fate, when the people begin to inquire, "Why give this franchise to capitalists; why enable banks and capitalists to issue their promises to pay without any burden of redemption; why shall not the people exercise this power? If more money is desirable, if that is the only thing, and there is no question as to the character of money, why not the United States issue the money? Sir, unless the burden of redemption is carried on the face of every bank-bill, there is no answer to the argument. If bank-notes and United States notes are not to be redeemed either in coin or bonds, if they are neither redeemable nor convertible, then there is no reason in the world why you shall have national-bank notes at all. Why not issue your greenbacks; why not follow the example of our revolutionary fathers; why not follow the example of the French and other nations that have issued irredeemable paper money, and let the people enjoy the profit? But, sir, if you add to the proposition something that will make these banks redeem their promises, make them as good as gold, or as near to it as public policy will allow, then you add that burden which is the only restraint on an irredeemable paper money. Senators, with my strong convictions on this subject, I can scarcely venture to express my ideas.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, if I have been misunderstood by the Senator, I am sure he is the only one on this floor. In what I said about equalizing the currency, I said I wanted the West and the South to be supplied, not by robbing the East, but by giving to them what they needed. I could not have been misunderstood on that point. The Senator is willing that we shall take $75,000,000, if need be, from the East to equalize the currency. His argument certainly meant that; and the Senator from Missouri expressed himself in favor of $50,000,000 if that was necessary, a little while ago. These are magnificent offers to give away $75,000,000 of other people's property to vindicate a principle. It is on the principle of Artemus Ward, who was willing to sacrifice all his wife's relations for the purpose of preserving the Union. [Laughter.] And we know there is a magnificent case recorded in the New Testament where a large offer of other people's property was made on certain terms and conditions. Here is an offer of from twenty-five to seventy-five millions of the bank currency of New England to vindicate a great principle!

Mr. SHERMAN. And yet my friend was the first one to offer this identical proposition in 1870.

Mr. MORTON. I do not remember that I was. I think my friend is mistaken about that. But it has gone by, and that is a dead letter; and I think no member of this Senate believes that $25,000,000 will ever be taken from New England and given to the West and South. The idea of taking $50,000,000 and giving it to the West and South is a perfect sham. It will never be done. Nobody expects it to be done. It is a mere delusion which is being held out for the purpose of preserving things in their present condition. I am willing to deal with practical questions, but I think there is nobody in this country who believes that $25,000,000 or $10,000,000 will be taken from one State and given to another. The people of the State from which it is taken will regard it as an act of spoliation and robbery, I do not care what their Senators may say on this floor; it will be resisted; it will be resisted by lawsuits; it will be resisted in every way. There is a plain and fair course, and that is to allow the people of the West and South, wherever they want a bank in my State, in Iowa, or elsewhere, to come and get that bank upon the same terms with others. These dangers of inflation are gross exaggerations.

Mr. LOGAN. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator in that connection?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. How is it that the Senator from Ohio reconciles these two propositions: first, in his argument some days ago, he did not believe the twenty-five millions that are to be distributed by being taken from the East and divided between the West and South, would be taken up in two years? I believe he stated that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. If the distribution of $25,000,000 would not be taken up in two years, how can it be that if we pass a law so that anybody can take it, it will ruin the whole country in six months?

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought when my friend from Indiana made that argument the other day it needed no answer; but my friend from Maine answered it perfectly. In the West and South we all know they have not the capital to invest in national banks, and we know they cannot do it. Their means are employed in agricultural pursuits, and other pursuits, and they have not the surplus capital and bonds to enable them to engage in banking. But make the opportunity to bank free all over the United States, and it will be availed of by men in New England and New York, where they have large accumulations of capital, and you will have plenty of banks organized.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I will ask, in connection with that, how the Senator reconciles these arguments? He says that it takes away from New England because New England has an excess of circulation more than is needed, and distributes it to the West; and in the next breath he says New England will issue millions more.

Mr. SHERMAN. I reconcile the positions in this way: I think it is but fair and right to all portions of the country that each portion should have a certain part of the bank circulation according to the ratio fixed by law, and the distribution of that sum is an arbitrary distribution; but, on the whole, it is fair—one half according to population, and the other half according to productions and wealth. As long as the western and southern sections want any portion of this bank circulation, they ought to have it up to that proportion; and if the East have, by a misconstruction of the law, more than they ought to have, it is better to withdraw it.

Mr. LOGAN. One other question and I am through, for I do not want to discuss the matter. In the argument that the Senator made the other day to the Senate he insisted that the faith of the Government was pledged, and ought to be irrevocably so, that they never would issue more than $400,000,000 of greenbacks. I believe that was the argument. A moment ago he asked, if we want to inflate the currency, why not issue greenbacks instead of national-bank currency? How does he reconcile that?

Mr. SHERMAN. Did the Senator suppose I was in favor of issuing greenbacks?

Mr. LOGAN. If you were not, I do not see why you should suggest to the Senate to do that in place of the other. I want to see the positions reconciled; that is all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am opposed to both until we come back to the coin standard. I said, if I had to choose between two evils, I greatly preferred to violate the obligation that we made in 1869, in one particular, by giving the benefit to the United States of issuing the currency, rather than violate the same obligation in an indirect way by issuing more irredeemable paper currency, or redeemable only in greenbacks. There was no inconsistency in my positions. Sir, the only consistent position in the whole matter is to repeal all these limitations and regulations about the distribution of bank circulation, and require these banks to redeem their notes in coin, or, for the present, until coin can be accumulated, in bonds of the United States.

[Mr. BOGY addressed the Senate. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, I must beg a few minutes to avail myself of the opportunity to compliment my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] for the very eloquent and enlightened speech that he has delivered to the Senate. Certainly I have been delighted to hear him. His manner, his ideas, and all, are impressive, delightful, and clear. I am told that "an honest confession is good for the soul." He has come near convincing me that I have held wrong impressions upon this all-important subject from the beginning. He has now, to my mind, unmistakably cut the gordian knot. He has, beyond a doubt, in my humble opinion, made known to the Senate the manner in which we can pay the great national debt that now hangs over us. His manner of doing it, however, I cannot indorse, but it is a very great temptation; though it is certainly clear, as I think I can demonstrate to the Senator, from his ideas, from his language, and his law and the facts associated with everything that he has said on the subject, that his plan is impracticable.

He tells us that we have a statute which requires all import duties to be paid in gold. That is correct. He says that they have yielded, up to this period, about $200,000,000 per annum. That is agreed. He says upon the same line that they will continue thus to yield. It will be seen clearly and unquestionably that we shall be annually possessed of $100,000,000 of gold in excess of any demands against the Government, for the $100,000,000 set apart by statute to pay the interest upon our foreign debt; but as to citizens of the United States, they must take care of themselves; they must bushwhack it and do the best they can. If the measure now presented to the Senate should become a law, I have no question of the result, for history authorizes me to arrive at but one conclusion, and daily experience teaches me nothing else, nor do I believe anything else successfully can be taught. History is repeating itself. The centennial question was up this morning, and it reminds me that a hundred years ago there was a debt hanging over the American nation that had been made by and through our struggle for independence. We know what became of it. In a few years, if we go on the downward slide as is now contemplated, in my opinion the same state of things will exist as to our present debt. This is a mighty debt, and millions have been created; and if we go on, it too will suffer the fate that the continental money of 1776 did.

Now, sir, I go further. The idea presented by my friend so ably as to what should be done with the one hundred millions excess of gold that we have every year is directly in line with that which the Government has been doing. We have gone into the market regularly every two weeks for two or three years, and we have sold gold, sold a million or two millions, as the case might be, as was understood, for the purpose of maintaining the credit of the Union and protecting our currency. We were thus speculating. Now, upon the same line of speculation, you are to have your secret agent, if you please—it would not look well for the Government to do it, but the same line suggests the idea—send your agents out with that $100,000,000 to buy currency when our money will be depreciated, a bank having sprung up at every cross-roads in this broad nation as now contemplated, giving thereby plenty of money without metes or bounds. Do that, and at a very early period you will see this money bought up at two for one, and then it will go down to ten for one; and it would not take as many years as it might be at first supposed to require before the whole edition might be bought up with the one hundred millions of specie that we should receive in excess over our requirements from our imports.

Why, sir, how was it in 1836, in the days of the proud old Jackson? I indorse him as a good man, but many of his acts were not indorsed by me during his life; but he died a Christian, and his many good deeds live to-day in the remembrance of his countrymen. When he jumped on old Mr. Biddle and the United States Bank, from his success in that assault sprang up State banks all over the Union, and there the United States had her deposits from time to time. They were all over mighty New England, and the far West that is now peopled; they were not far from Saint Louis—the mighty city that my friend so ably represents—with her three hundred thousand people; they were in Illinois. In Missouri and Illinois there were land offices, with their respective registers, each officer having two or three rooms. A man would go there, having ridden a hundred or two hundred miles, with his wallet in one hand and his meat and bread in the other, having in the wallet just refuse money enough to buy his forty or eighty acres, as the case might be, for a homestead. When he got there he had to go through the mill, and he was ground over, and they made known to him, "Your money will not answer the purpose."

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator allow me a word? The gentleman answers my speech, thinking I have advocated the creation of the old State banks.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator misunderstood my argument.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I am directly against them.

Mr. BOGY. I am against the old State-bank system. I am for the national-bank system, but giving to the States the power to say what number of banks shall exist in them, and where they shall be located, preserving all the national features as to security and circulation.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I will stop if you include the greenbacks. [Laughter.]

The applicant in the case I have supposed in 1836, seeking his little home, would have to put himself into the mill, and he would be ground over to the tune of about 100 per cent. before he could get a little location to take his family to. Thus it was with the State-bank system in those days; and now when you tell me that this is a panacea in any way, manner, or shape to appreciate the currency by extending it in untold millions—for really, as contemplated by my distinguished friend's amendment from Pennsylvania, it is unlimited—I do not believe it. I dislike to go against anything that my friend from Pennsylvania presents, recognizing his experience and ability and all that is so well due to him; but the question is clear to me. The history of the United States admonishes me unmistakably that if we do not now come up and act in good faith and redeem the solemn pledge made to the nation, that at the earliest practicable period you would resume specie payments, in other words, pay coin for this indebtedness, at a very early period your money will go down, as all paper money preceding it in all countries whose example can possibly be invoked has done, and it will be anything else than beneficial to the Union, but it will be destructive to it beyond a doubt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] to the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. CAMERON. Before we come to a vote, I want to correct a typographical error. In line 5 I wish to insert "so much" before "of;" so as to read:

And so much of the several acts supplementary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as perfected will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That so much of the twenty-second section of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, and so much of the several acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, and such of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, and so much or such parts of any other act or acts of Congress as limit, or as may be construed to limit or restrict, the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued under the said act of June 3, 1864, and the several supplements thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that hereafter all associations organized, or that may be organized, for carrying on the business of banking, under the provisions of said act, shall be free to establish and organize national banks with circulation, at any place within the several States and Territories of the United States, upon the terms and conditions, and subject to all the limitations and restrictions, now provided by law, except the limitation upon the entire amount of circulation, which is hereby repealed.

Mr. CAMERON. I understand there are two or three Senators absent in consequence of sickness in their families, and I would rather, therefore, that this vote should be put off until to-morrow.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is always some one absent.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The Senate is pretty full, I think.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well.

Mr. FLANAGAN. The Senator from Mississippi, Mr. ALCORN, if he was here, would vote "yea." I should vote "nay." So I have agreed to pair off with him.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, Mr. INGALLS. He would vote in the affirmative, and I should vote in the negative.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. SPRAGUE, has been suddenly called out of the Senate by indisposition in his family. If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay" but that I have paired with him.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to state that the Senator from Vermont, Mr. EDMUNDS, is paired with the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. DORSEY. The Senator from Vermont, if he were here, would vote "nay," and the Senator from Arkansas would vote "yea."

The call of the yeas and nays was concluded.

Mr. GORDON, (who had first voted in the affirmative.) I did not understand when my friend from Delaware, Mr. BAYARD, left that I was paired, except on the question of a return to specie payments; but I am reminded by my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that the Senator differed very widely with me on this subject. I do not wish to be guilty of any breach of faith or run any risk. I will therefore withdraw my vote, and state that I am paired with the Senator from Delaware. If he were here he would vote "nay," as I understand, and I should vote "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will be permitted to withdraw his vote if there be no objection.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Logan, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Tipton, West, Windom, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Stockton, Sumner, and Wadleigh—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boreman, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Ingalls, Lewis, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stevenson, and Thurman—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the instructions moved by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] as an amendment to the motion to recommit.

Mr. GORDON. I offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, to strike out all after the word "instructed," and insert:

To report a bill for free banking and providing for the convertibility of the United States Treasury notes into low-interest bonds or gold coin, at the option of the Government, and the bonds convertible into United States Treasury notes at the option of the holder.

I will state in a word that I offer this amendment in order to bring to the support of free banking a number of gentlemen who otherwise cannot vote for it. I think with this amendment we may carry it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Would it be in order now to strike out the words "and the bonds convertible into United States Treasury notes at the option of the holder?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would not be in order. This is an amendment to an amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLANAGAN, (when his name was called.) In this case again I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, Mr. ALCORN. If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. GORDON, (when his name was called.) Does the Senator from Ohio think this amendment would be included in my pair with the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think so.

Mr. GORDON. Very well, then; I shall not vote.

Mr. OGLESBY, (when his name was called.) I just came into my seat before the roll-call commenced. The amendment was being read, but I did not distinctly understand it, and several gentlemen near me have not distinctly understood the meaning of a part of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the last clause of it read over again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will direct the whole amendment to be read.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment of Mr. GORDON.

The call of the roll was concluded.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. SPRAGUE. I do not know how he would vote on this particular proposition; but I shall not vote. He is for expansion, as I understand, and I am opposed to it.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Logan, Mitchell, Norwood, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Tipton, and Windom—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stewart, Stockton, Sumner, Wadleigh, and Wright—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Ingalls, Lewis, Morton, Oglesby, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and West—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOPER. I offer the following in lieu of the instructions proposed by the Senator from North Carolina:

To report a bill providing for the convertibility of United States Treasury notes into gold coin or 5 per cent. bonds of the United States, and also for free banking under the provisions of the national-bank act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I was going to ask for the yeas and nays. ["Too late."]

Mr. STEWART. Is there any motion to reconsider?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the call for the yeas and nays is not now in order. The Chair waited before declaring the result, and no such call was made.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There was no doubt about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The same vote comes up again on the next question.

Mr. ALLISON. The question now is on the final adoption of the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina as amended by the amendment just acted on.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the substitute of the Senator from Tennessee was adopted for my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reconsideration.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Did the Senator from North Carolina vote in the affirmative?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was no division called for, and the yeas and nays were not asked. The motion is in order.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from North Carolina, I think, voted in the wrong way to justify his moving a reconsideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot know the fact, as no division was called for. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. MERRIMON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. Now I think this proposition had better be reported once more. I do not understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And that the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, instructed to report a bill providing for the convertibility of United States Treasury notes into gold coin or 5 per cent. bonds of the United States, and also for free banking under the provisions of the national-bank act.

Mr. MORTON. I simply want to state that that was the proposition of the Committee on Finance last winter, authorizing the conversion of the greenbacks into a 5 per cent. bond, and free banking simply upon those terms; involving, as was argued last winter, and I think very clearly, and I do not propose to go over it now, the rapid absorption of the greenbacks, and contraction.

Mr. SCHURZ. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senate. I suppose it must have become clear to a great many Senators who formerly were hotly in favor of instructions, that the best thing we can do, after all, if we want to recommit this bill at all, is to recommit it without instructions.

Several SENATORS. Let us take the vote.

Mr. SCHURZ. Very well.

Mr. HOWE. I want to say a word on the pending proposition. If I understand it—and I am not at all sure that I do—it is a proposition requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish 5 per cent. bonds at par, as long as anybody wants them, for greenbacks, and buy them back at a premium when he has a surplus of money in the Treasury.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not understand that to be so. I differ very much from my friend from Wisconsin. I do not see what authority there is in these instructions to buy back bonds for notes. It seems to me to be a very simple proposition, a proposition to authorize free banking; and then, as under the banking law, the banks are required to redeem their notes in legal-tender notes. These instructions will direct the committee to bring in a bill to say that the Government shall redeem its legal-tender notes in 5 per cent. bonds, which virtually brings legal-tender notes to par in specie. That is the extent of it.

Mr. HOWE. That is not the extent of it, is it? Let it be read once more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. COOPER.

Mr. HOWE. Now, what is to be done with the legal-tender notes when redeemed?

Mr. COOPER. They are with the Treasury, to be used if needed. It is not to retire the greenbacks. They are left in existence, to be used by the Secretary of the Treasury as the needs of the Government require.

Mr. HOWE. Then I did misunderstand the proposition.

Mr. COOPER. There is no provision for the purchase of bonds, or for the cancellation of greenbacks. I do not desire any cancellation, nor their use again, unless for the ordinary expenses of the Government.

Mr. HOWE. It is simply a proposition, then, to enable the holder of a greenback to put it in the Treasury and get interest on it, or get a bond paying 5 per cent. interest; but the note cannot be canceled, but must lie in the Treasury.

Mr. SARGENT. It may be paid out in Government expenses, like other money.

Mr. STEWART. It is a proposition to pay our debts.

Mr. HOWE. No; it is not a proposition to pay your debt, because the debt is so much larger as the bonds are issued.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It seems to me the proposition is perfectly clear that the holders of United States notes may present them at the Treasury and demand redemption. The Secretary of the Treasury may redeem in coin, or he may redeem in 5 per cent. bonds. The money, the United States notes being in the Treasury, would be like any other money in the Treasury, to be used for any purpose for which any other money could be used. If there should be an excess of currency for the ordinary expenses of the Government, that excess would accumulate unless 6 per cent. bonds were at something less than par in gold. In that case these accumulations could be used for the purchase of 6 per cent. bonds; but if 6 per cent. bonds should be in excess of par in coin, there would be no relief. The notes would accumulate to the extent of the disposition of the people to convert.

Mr. GORDON. Would not the effect be to that extent, let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts, to contract the currency?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Undoubtedly, to that extent.

Mr. SHERMAN. The details of such a bill would undoubtedly provide the purposes for which the notes could be reissued. The principle of this proposition I can vote for with pleasure. The difficulty suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts is one of detail. The money comes into the Treasury of the United States, and is the property of the United States, the money of the United States, legal tender, and it can be used by the Government of the United States for any purpose that the law may authorize. As a matter of course, any committee in framing a bill under such instructions would provide the necessary details to carry it into execution. They may provide the uses and purposes for which the money should be used.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But will the Senator from Ohio question this proposition, that if there should be a disposition on the part of the holders of United States notes to convert them into 5 per cent. bonds, and if the accumulations consequent upon such disposition and practice, together with the ordinary revenues of the Government, should exceed the ordinary expenses of the Government, there would be an accumulation of these notes in the Treasury, exhibited as a currency balance, for which there could be no use except the purchase of 6 per cent. bonds? And inasmuch as the power of the Treasury is limited in the purchase of 6 per cent. bonds to such bonds as can be bought at less than par, the power of the Treasurer to relieve the contraction which might be produced by the conversion of United States notes into 5 per cent. bonds would be dependent upon the price of 6 per cent. bonds in coin.

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly in a bill to carry out these instructions some details would be required to express the purpose for which the money could be used. As a matter of course, any committee carrying into execution these instructions would make some provision for the purchase of 6 per cent. bonds, or for whatever it might be deemed public policy to use the money in. Undoubtedly the natural use would be to purchase 6 per cent. bonds.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Let me ask the Senator from Ohio if there can be any other use to which a surplus can be applied, after the ordinary expenses of the Government are paid, except the purchase of 6 per cent. bonds.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would not be in favor of such use; but as a matter of course the use of the money would be regulated by the details of the bill reported.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is there any other use within the knowledge of the Senator from Ohio to which surplus money could be applied, however acquired?

Mr. SHERMAN. In my judgment it ought not to be used for any purpose; but, as a matter of course, the law might allow it to be used for other purposes. But the money could be used in the payment of bonds. Suppose the 5 per cent. bonds are worth, as they are to-day, ninety-nine and a half cents on the dollar; these notes may be converted into 5 per cent. bonds; that makes the notes equal to bonds worth ninety-nine and a half cents on the dollar. As a matter of course, the law would provide some means by which these notes might be applied to the purchase of 6 per cent. bonds; but, as the Senator properly says, the 6 per cent. bonds can only be purchased at par in gold. But we have a right by law now to pay off $12,000,000 of 6 per cents at par in gold. Consequently the only loss there would be to the Government would be the difference between the value of 5 per cent. bonds at 99½ or 99 and par in gold; in other words, the effect of it would be that the Government could use this money to buy gold with which to pay the bonds that would be called in.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I would suggest to the chairman of the Finance Committee that a better provision would be to burn them up, as the increase of bank currency by free banking would more than supply their place.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would be a question left to be reported upon by the Committee on Finance, and entirely open to discussion. My honorable friend from Vermont and myself would differ as to the use to which the law might require these notes to be applied. And perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts would differ with us. But that is a matter of detail which will certainly be reported to the Senate by the committee, and the whole subject will then be presented for the action of the Senate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The Senator from Vermont suggests a second use. Every Senator will see that that means contraction—absolute, positive, uncertain as to amount that may take place, or as to the time when. Therefore I think that, except for those Senators who are in favor of contraction, that view of the ultimate result of this policy is inadmissible.

Now, as to the other, which is the alternative proposition—the reinvestment of these notes in 6 per cent. bonds. You work a temporary contraction by the accumulation of a currency balance in the Treasury, unless those bonds can be purchased with United States notes at something less than par; and the accumulation of a currency balance in the Treasury of the United States, for all the purposes of business, is precisely the same as a contraction produced by the withdrawal of the notes from circulation and their positive destruction; only there is a power of reissue, whenever the time comes that they can be reissued for any lawful purpose.

I did not intend to mingle so far in the debate. This is only a proposition for contraction, uncertain as to the time when or as to the amount.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BOGY. Would not the contraction brought about by the conversion of greenbacks into 5 per cent. bonds be more than overbalanced by the creation of national-bank notes under this free-banking law, and in time have the effect of entirely retiring the legal-tender notes and substituting national-bank notes? Would not that be the effect?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot say. I am not on the floor for the purpose of discussing the question of free banking. I have always voted against it.

Mr. BOGY. The proposition is coupled with free banking.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is. I do not think it is in the way of compensation.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Mr. President, instead of going into detail, I should hope the proposition might go to the committee as it is, and leave it for the committee to bring forward a bill with such details as they think proper, and then leave it to the Senate to determine whether they will approve or modify those details.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, did we need illustration of the loose and aimless futility of the mode in which we are proceeding, I submit we have it now. We are dealing with a great and many-sided subject hap-hazard and by guess. Without any appropriate measure before us we are plying each other with vague generalities and incomplete suggestions, upon which we are to vote as they are read one after another; and this is the way we are asked to solve one of the gravest and most intricate problems which can possibly confront us. By our own action we cast away the aid upon which we rely even in trivial and simple cases. The invention of the moment is substituted, when dealing with supreme and complex affairs, for that careful process of legislation which has been found safest and best for eight hundred years in England, for a century of our own, and from the beginning of legislative bodies everywhere. Is this wise or pardonable? Is it safe in such a matter to dispense altogether with action by a committee in its committee-room, where not only general principles, but details and minute particulars, can be exactly adjusted and perfected, and printed that we may study and understand them? Shall we legislate on the wing, without waiting to hear from the appropriate committee?

The Finance Committee has brought forward no plan. The Senate has been pleased, by discussing the general subject, to postpone the action of the committee, so that we have not even the excuse for proceeding we might have had the committee been derelict or laggard. It is true the committee has reported several minor special bills—bills not professing to enter at all upon the subject at large, but for exceptional and collateral purposes. One was a bill to assist banks in ridding themselves of their circulation in certain rare cases; and there have been three other bills, one of which is now before us, all limited and fragmentary, touching the skirts here and there of matters financial in character, and all abstaining purposely from the general subject. But we have had, and as we are going on we are to have, from the committee no plan, no project, no system, no solution, as a whole, of finance, nor even of currency or banking.

What is the product thus far of this unusual, if not blind and hazardous, proceeding? What end have we reached?

What have we at this moment? We have adopted, and are instantly asked to reconsider, a Delphic proposition which it needs no ex-Secretary of the Treasury, no expert in finance, to inform us means either one thing or the opposite, depending on an arrangement of details not implied or hinted at in the proposition itself. Without even a division, the Senate has just declared for free banking, United States notes to be convertible into 5 per cent. bonds. Who does not see that this is but a juggle of words? Who does not see that it means contraction to the contractionist and expansion to the expansionist? Who does not see that whether the language points north or points south, whether it means contraction or means expansion, depends on the ultimate destiny and disposition of the greenbacks? And yet what is to be done with the greenbacks nowhere appears.

If the greenbacks after reaching the Treasury are to be paid out again for current expenses, or in a crisis for bonds, as $13,000,000 were at once of the $44,000,000 reserve, a child can tell without slate or pencil that the transaction is expansion, if it be expansion to add to the volume of paper money afloat. On the contrary, if the meaning be that greenbacks having been paid to the Treasury for bonds, which bonds are to become the basis of bank circulation, are, in the language of the Senator from Vermont, to be burned up, blotted out, and never reissued, the process is contraction. Why? Because the bank currency to be received upon the bonds purchased with the greenbacks is to be 10 per cent. less than the bonds, and 10 per cent. less than the greenbacks, and it is to be lessened also in effect by the requirement of a reserve to be maintained by the banks. Thus, if greenbacks are to be paid to the Government for bank circulation, and the greenbacks are to be destroyed, in place of substituting one for the other, dollar for dollar, you will have substituted one for the other less a large diminution. This is contraction as sure as gravitation. The language before us is equally consistent with either view. In other words, in the form of instructing the committee what to report we have adopted a declaration which looks to the right as much as it does to the left, which tends equally upward or downward, which leads to expansion as clearly as it leads to con traction.

What progress are we making? What light are we shedding upon anything in doubt? What are we doing except to expend the time of the Senate, and, as politicians sometimes say, "making a record"—a record not likely to be useful even in tripping one more than another of the parties to it? It seems to me, all having had abundant opportunity to express their views at large, and to record themselves upon one governing point, that we might now all consent to let the whole matter go back to the Committee on Finance without instructions. Let them work out and report some theory practically applied, giving us the detail and machinery by which it is to be executed The Senate may then advisedly concur with the committee or take issue with it. The Senate can then perfect the work of the committee, or overthrow it altogether, and by better light find ground approved by the general judgment.

It may be, Mr. President, that I am adding to the expenditure of time by an appeal to Senators to put an end to these uncertain doings by allowing the bill to return to the committee without further attempts at instructions. My apology must be that I have wasted no time and occupied none thus far during the debate, believing that if by possibility I had anything of value to suggest it were better withheld until something more definite had been matured, and the time had come for action.

Before taking my seat, however, I deem it due to frankness not to neglect to add my voice of warning and protest against all schemes for wholesale issues of irredeemable paper money. Conscious of the many things taught by the science of finance which I do not know, there is one thing which I think I do know, having learned it from the saddened and blackened annals of many epochs. Reason and experience convince me that we shall launch Government and people on a sea without shore or bottom when we legislate the nation out upon a sea of unlimited irredeemable paper money.

A note not to be paid or redeemed is a promise made to be broken, a promise made to be broken is a lie, and a lie will upset anything, from an apple-cart to an empire.

Paper money not to be paid or redeemed is a falsehood and a fraud. It can never be true, and therefore it can never be right or safe.

It is false that by stamping the mark of a dollar upon a bit of paper you transmute it into a dollar. It is false that you can thus reverse the truth of property and change the nature of value. Property is the product of labor. If it is true in value it represents the cost of production. A barrel of flour is a unit of value. Why? Because, a necessity of man, its price represents the cost of producing it. So of a diamond, a gem, a nugget of gold or of silver; so of a coined dollar, less only a small alloy put into it to cover the expenses of coinage, and to make it harder, that it may better bear attrition and to keep it out of the crucible of the artisan. Making allowance for this alloy, a coined dollar represents the cost of production. Redeemable paper money preserves the same reality.

When you have paper money redeemable you have only a symbolic currency; you have in the paper a symbol of the value behind it; but when you have no value behind it which the holder can reach, no redeemability, you have a mere floating false promise to pay.

I say nothing of the legal-tender acts, or the legal-tender policy. It was resorted to temporarily in the stress of dire emergency, to keep the flag of the Union flying in the field. Above all, it was supported by a pledge, oft repeated, to redeem it, and I am not now arguing for contraction of the currency. This is not the time to discuss the legal-tender acts; but now that no war threatens us, and no overmastering necessity is to be pleaded, guilty and mad will be the hour when Congress can find no better way to conduct the finances of the nation than to print an unlimited issue of irredeemable promises to pay. Had I believed that my voice would be heeded by Senators whose faces are set toward wild inflation, it should have been raised days ago in this debate. I advert to the matter now only incidentally and briefly, having risen, not to occupy the time of the Senate, but in the hope that Senators would not refuse to listen to an appeal to stop chopping logic, splitting hairs, and experimenting with general declarations, and give the committee opportunity to prepare a complete measure upon which the eminent Senators around me, learned in finance and in currency, can unite; and then those so little instructed as I will be safe in following.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, I have no other apology to offer for having remained silent during the long debate upon these financial questions than the apparent one, at least to my own consciousness, of an inability to throw any light upon the subject. I had no well-defined notion about what it was best for Congress to do, if it were thought best to attempt at this time to do anything. We are scarcely away yet from the reverberating echoes of the war. The public mind of this nation has been dwelling for the few years that have intervened since its close upon the sad spectacle of war, and its serious and fruitful results. The public mind of this nation has not been calmly contemplating the subject of national finance. As a people we have not thought deeply or broadly on the subject. The time, however, is coming when the American people must give serious consideration to these grave matters. We are but taking the preliminary step. I have not felt firm in any conclusions formed about it.

I will be frank to my constituents, as I am frank to this body, and make that open declaration to-day. I have sought, in common with honorable Senators here, to steer for the bright and clear course that would lead to a settlement of the questions before us and prosperity and satisfaction to the country. But, sir, I have not seen my way clear as to what my course as a legislator should be. I have listened to this debate now for two months. I have listened with benefit to myself. I am grateful the time has not come when there is justification for the declaration sometimes publicly made that the intellect or that the intelligence of the American Senate is waning. To my mind there is in this body ability, intellect, and experience, that will compare with the most favorable era of the American republic. There is ability here; there is integrity here; there is statesmanship here; there is simple, plain, common honesty here.

I confess that I have been benefited, and I trust enlightened, by this discussion. We have gone along, step by step, until at last we are confronted by a vote that has passed into the official journals of this body. A vote recorded less than thirty minutes ago says that it is the sense of the American Senate that we shall not have free banking. I stand here to-day to commend the wisdom of the republican Congress that gave us the greenbacks and gave us the national banking system. I stand reflecting the unanimous feeling of the whole country when I make the assertion that the issue of the Treasury note, elevated to dignity by attaching to it its legal-tender feature, in connection with the system of national banking, carried our country safely through the civil war. It has met with the universal favor of republicans and democrats, of all people, and is at this moment sustained by the indorsement and support of a larger number of American citizens than any other paper circulation ever received at any time since the organization of the Government.

Is it based upon gold? Is it based upon silver? No, sir; I will be frank; the national banking system and the legal-tender system, if I may call it a system, were neither of them based upon gold or silver. They were neither of them based upon the results of political science. Political economy formed no part of the consideration that entered into the public mind when these two great measures were inaugurated. They were based upon, and sprung from, absolute necessity, and the conviction of the American people that such measures were indispensable to the salvation of the country.

He who looks back to the narrow path of political economy to find reasons upon which to base our paper system will utterly fail. It was based upon the political economy of no country or of no author. It was based upon the political necessities of the times, and is therefore now to be treated and considered on a broader plane, and as a purely American question, disconnected in great part, if not entirely, from the theories of other times, and, as I think, of other countries. I will not, for I cannot now in the few moments I propose to speak—not upon finances, but rather upon the turn these proposed amendments are taking on the motion to recommit this subject to the Finance Committee—go further in the direction of sustaining these thoughts.

Here we are still within reach almost of the battle-cry and shouts of victory that closed the war, and we are now demanding, or a portion of our American people are demanding, a speedy redemption of the legal-tender. Sir, I maintain for that legal-tender to-day that it is as good as gold. The honor of this nation is pledged for its redemption in gold; it will be, and shall be, every dollar, redeemed in gold. We will never repudiate a dollar or a dime of it. Sir, it has upon it the impress of the best faith of this nation. It is the money sealed and sanctified with the best blood of the Republic. It is no disgrace to the nation; it is a noble currency, a grand trophy of the war, and held dear in the heart of every American citizen. We will redeem every dollar of it in gold, not to-day, not to-morrow, not upon the heels of a panic that no Senator yet has been able to fathom; no American citizen has comprehended, or fully comprehends, the mysteries of that panic; and not upon the heels of it will we venture to pass laws for the redemption of this currency.

We have attempted to legislate upon it at this session. What has been done? The Finance Committee reported a resolution to and asked this body for instructions. That led to a long and interesting debate, an instructive debate. I make the general average of it in giving this opinion, however; and in that general average I say it was an instructive and enlightening debate. We have taken one vote. The RECORD will show that yesterday the Senate declined to instruct the Finance Committee to report back measures here for the redemption of the national-bank circulation, either in coin or in Government bonds. Another vote of this Senate, already recorded, has refused to instruct that committee to report back measures here that, if the national banking system should be made free, or if any addition of circulation should be provided for, pari passu with it the legal-tenders should be redeemed to the extent of eighty-five dollars of legal-tenders for every one hundred of increased bank circulation. The Senate refused to instruct the committee to report such a measure as that. Then came the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, which, plain, straight, unvarnished, was for free banking under our present national-bank law; and the Senate refused, by a vote that has now gone into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to instruct the Finance Committee to report free banking.

Now comes the pending instruction which has been passed by this body, and what have you now instructed that committee to do? I take the liberty to read the proposition. Are we acting like intelligent men? Have we for the moment, at this late hour of the day when nature is weary and tired, in some freak of momentary relief, forgotten ourselves, making a record we ought to and shall be held responsible for, adopting language that means nothing? How is that committee going to construe these instructions that they have just received from the Senate?

That the Committee on Finance be instructed to report back to this body a bill increasing the national-bank circulation $46,000,000, or to an amount not exceeding $400,000,000, with instructions also to report a bill providing for the convertibility of United States Treasury notes into coin.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. OGLESBY. Have we not just moved to reconsider the vote by which that was passed? Was it not passed? And is there not a motion pending to reconsider it?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois is mistaken. The amendment which I offered was adopted in lieu of the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina; and the motion now is to reconsider the vote adopting it in lieu of that.

Mr. OGLESBY. As a substitute?

Mr. COOPER. Yes; it is not attached to it.

Mr. OGLESBY. That only shows how confused this body has been for the last hour. [Laughter.] I am not sure that there is any pending probability that I shall extricate it at all. [Laughter.] But I do not wish to have my name go upon the Journals of this body and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as instructing the Committee on Finance to report a bill providing for the convertibility of United States notes into coin. We have always talked about the redeemability of the legal-tenders; we have always talked about a possible time when they might be redeemed with coin or redeemed with something else; but the American Senate stands here late this afternoon instructing its Finance Committee deliberately to introduce a bill that shall provide for the convertibility of greenbacks into coin. Well might the Senator from New York lecture us in the able and magnificent manner in which he can and always does. I do not wish to vote upon that resolution.

With instructions to report a bill providing for the convertibility of United States Treasury notes into gold coin or 5 per cent. bonds of the United States.

What construction will the Finance Committee put upon that intelligent instruction? Will they report back a bill here the leading feature of which will be free banking? No; because the Senate has refused to sustain free banking, and the leading idea of the Finance Committee will not be for free banking, and it will be sustained by the vote of this Senate in not being so led. We have instructed them here that free banking is not what this body desires. Therefore when they come to consider this proposition and to bring back a bill, the leading feature of that bill will not be free banking. It will be in subordination to these other instructions, to convert the legal-tender notes into coin or a 5 per cent. bond of the United States. What do you mean, Senators? Do you mean to say that that convertibility shall be at the option of the Treasury of the United States, or do you mean to say it shall be at the option of the holder of legal-tender notes? If you leave the Finance Committee to put its interpretation on that language, and the Finance Committee shall report a bill providing for the convertibility of greenbacks into national 5 or 6 per cent. bonds, at the pleasure of the Government or at the pleasure of the holder, it can quote in the face of the Senate its vote of instructions to do that very thing. Therefore the instructions the Senate is giving to the Finance Committee are not intelligible or intelligent instructions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not believe both of us together will make this thing any better than I am making it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am very much inclined to think that is so; but if my honorable friend will yield to me for a moment I will remind him that it is about half-past five o'clock, with very little probability of closing this matter to-night; and if he will yield for the purpose of an adjournment I should be glad to move it.

Mr. OGLESBY. I concur with the honorable Senator in his solicitude about an adjournment. I have been dying for one for three hours, [laughter;] but it would not be fair to adjourn in the middle of a sentence, when that sentence, unexplained, would be no more intelligible than the resolution of instructions I hold in my hand. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope it will keep over until morning, and we can put the two together in the morning and the Senator can go on with his speech.

Mr. OGLESBY. I will adjourn in a few moments. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois declines to be interrupted.

Mr. OGLESBY. I say I shall vote against these instructions whatever interpretation may be put upon my act by my people at home or in this nation. I hope I shall live long enough and have health enough to explain to them what my honest view about it was, upon this little resolution which is destined to become a very important paper in American political financial literature. There is no escaping it, and I shall carry it with me, and no doubt will have a great necessity for it to explain myself to the intelligent people of Illinois.

Now, sir, the fiat of this body is recorded against free banking. I was somewhat in doubt as to whether it was the best thing to be done at this time. My preference was—and that is all I am at liberty to say; it concerns no Senator; I am well and thoroughly persuaded it will affect no Senator; but as it is customary and excusable for gentlemen to say "My opinion is this way or that way," or "I think so and so," catching that fever, and benefiting by that example, which is very healthy to new beginners in this body—I say that my opinions about free banking were not well fixed. I did not know that it was the best thing for us to do at this time; but I had made up my mind to vote either for a House bill or a bill in the Senate to legalize the issue of the $44,000,000 legal-tenders, to put them back to $400,000,000, and there let them stand as an entirety, and to be treated by this American people and this American Congress as a solitary grand fact. I will not undertake to redeem them by retiring them and contracting the currency. You may begin to-day, the Secretary of the Treasury, the republican party, or any other political party, may begin to retire the legal-tenders to-day, redeeming them in gold or in bonds, and you will not r tire one hundred millions before you will arouse a voice of general and universal indignation throughout the land that you or I nor none of us can meet. The only fair way to deal with the legal-tenders is to put them at $400,000,000, where they were put in war. Let them stand together and be treated together as an entirety, and the time will come as surely as you and I sit here, without any of the peculiar modes of political economy, without any of the intricate political financial science that bothers us quite as much as it enlightens us, in the good time of the natural growth of our country, when they will reach par, when they will be converted in the hands of the people into gold, and from gold back into greenbacks again; and I declare then, and then I shall maintain, that that will be a redemption by the Government; and it is the only redemption they will ever have under the sun; and that is the way they will ultimately be redeemed, by growing to par with gold in the hands of the people, and not by a formal redemption at the Treasury by the nation. The general indisposition to part with this favored and popular circulation, under American politics, will hold them in the hands of the people until they shall grow to par with coin, when the universal verdict of an intelligent people will be that they are fairly, honestly, fully redeemed by the United States.

I then favored the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] and took the liberty to go across and suggest to him that it would be a good thing to do, although he had already made up his mind to do so, to add $46,000,000 of national-bank circulation to the currency of the country. You would then have $400,000,000 of legal-tenders and $400,000,000 in national-bank circulation, making a grand total of paper circulation of $800,000,000, and possibly $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 of gold in circulation; and I am not prepared conscientiously to say that it is too much for this American people or for the necessities of the times.

I have listened attentively to the arguments of the able Senators who have argued in the direction of what they thought a reasonable return to specie payments. I do not find it in my heart to impugn their motives, for I could very clearly see that they were actuated by an honest desire to do right; but I differed from their reasoning. It is not the time to lay the groundwork or the platform of a return to specie payments now. It can never be done by law. Victories can as well be won by law. Neither is the result of statutory enactment. You may pass measures looking in that direction; you may adopt laws to ameliorate the condition of the country; you may pass laws to facilitate commerce; you may pass laws to increase and to protect the industries of the country; you may pass laws to elevate labor, to favor labor, to encourage labor, to encourage the laboring community of the country; you may pass laws of a general and liberal nature, that in their wide and humane scope take in the lowest man in the land with the highest man in the land; and thus, bringing universal prosperity, you may bring the Government back to where we will stand upon what is commonly called a specie basis.

Now we have turned our backs upon free banking. I liked the present national system. I confess I like it still. I am not dubious of it. I am not suspicious of it. I do not believe it is a time to circumvent the industries of our country. I do not believe it is in the hands of dishonest and corrupt men. I do not believe it will fall into the hands of dishonest and bad men. It has been a good system. It has given us a good currency. There was some limitation on the amount. Neither republicans nor democrats in this country like anything that bears the aspect of monopoly, or special privileges, or special franchises, or exclusive or special rights. It is not consistent with the humanity and common sense of the American genius. Therefore I was in favor, and did at last make up my mind to vote, and did vote, to remove that restriction and let the banking privileges, whatever they are, extend to the country. That has been defeated in this body.

The next thing we can hope for is the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. If that shall be defeated, then we will come back and place ourselves in the tender mercies of that other branch of the Senate—honorable, good, noble Senators they are—who will take charge of the finances on a specie basis. If we can do no better, if we cannot get what we want, if we cannot get what we believe is right, I tell those gentlemen I will throw nothing in their way; I will stubbornly resist nothing; I will help them to modify their measures all I can; but in helping them I will steadily tell them that they are wrong; that they are premature in their action; that they will bring misery where they intend to bring happiness.

Now, sir, I wish to say a word more, as I have been forced to say something by that irresistible desire which people cannot always control, yet I think under the discipline of the experience of the Senate I have behaved pretty well for two solid months. It is about as much as human nature can stand to remain silent that long in the midst of so much eloquence, so much logic, so much splendid debate, and I say this in none other than a serious and truthful spirit. I can add nothing to it, God knows. That I know and so do the people know who sent me here. If I should make a mistake in voting on these financial measures, I will go back to Illinois and will meet a people who will indulgently hear any explanation I may have to make about it. I am not afraid to vote in this body. I know the people who sent me here will hear me at home. The fact about it was that on the very day of my election by the Legislature we had an agreement that amounted almost to that. I said to them that for the first two or three years I might make mistakes, and if so they must excuse me, and they nodded all around, all over the house, "yes," [laughter;] so that I feel pretty safe.

I meant to vote and did in earnest vote for free banking. I would vote for it again in this Chamber, and will if the opportunity again offers. If I cannot get that, I will vote for forty-six millions, or that number of millions which will carry the national-bank circulation up to $400,000,000. If I cannot get that, I will take what I can get, and trust to luck, the experience of time, and the reason of the future, to adjust our financial affairs upon a sound, healthy, and enduring basis; but I cannot vote at this time for any measure tending, as this last amendment does, to contraction.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 19, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. J. W. PARKER, D. D., of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CURRENCY.

Mr. KILLINGER. I had intended to submit some remarks on questions connected with the currency when the bill on that subject comes before the House for consideration. I find, however, I will have to be absent several days, and therefore ask permission to print them in the RECORD. [See Appendix.]

There was no objection.

APACHE INDIANS IN ARIZONA AND NEW MEXICO.

Mr. AVERILL, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Indian Affairs a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a statement of indebtedness on account of collecting upon reservations and subsisting Apache Indians in Arizona and New Mexico prior to July 1, 1873, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

TITLES OF CERTAIN NAVAL OFFICERS, ETC.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Naval Affairs, for present consideration, the bill (S. No. 269) to change the titles of certain naval officers, and for other purposes.

The bill was read. It provides that from and after the passage of the act the title of first assistant engineer shall be changed to passed assistant engineer, and that the title of second assistant engineer shall be changed to assistant engineer; provided that the regulations of the Navy Department in relation to the examinations and amount of sea-service previous to each examination be complied with. In its second section it provides that from and after the 30th day of June, 1874, the course of instruction at the Naval Academy, for cadet engineers shall be four years instead of two, as now provided by law; and this provision shall first apply to the class of cadet engineers entering the Academy in the year 1874, and to all subsequent classes; and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith be, and the same are thereby, repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, will give some explanation, particularly in regard to the second section of this bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The second section proposes to extend the time of instruction at the Naval Academy for cadet engineers. This is a new branch of the work of the Naval Academy. It is only within a few years that engineers have been educated at that institution at all. Formerly only officers of the line were there educated. But under a law passed some years ago the Secretary authorizes competitive examinations, at which a large number of boys appear, and selects about fifteen ordinarily from the whole number to remain at the Academy for two years. But it has been found, after a little experience, that that time is too short. It is found that they should remain there four years, the same as those designed to be officers of the line. This bill merely lengthens the time from two to four years.

The first section, which changes the titles of the engineers, is simply for the purpose of adopting the language used in the Navy. When we fixed the rank of staff officers of the Navy two years ago the act made use of the titles "first assistant engineer" and "second assistant engineer" instead of "passed assistant engineer" and "assistant engineer," the titles which had been customary. That change is desired by the Navy Department, and I suppose there will be no objection to it.

The object of having the bill adopted now is that the Navy Department may notify members of Congress to nominate boys for this competitive examination. Arrangements for that have to be made immediately, as the notices have to be sent out 1st of March, the examination taking place in June. The Naval Committee of the House examined the bill pretty carefully and were unanimously in favor of it. There are about fifteen annually selected, but each member of Congress is requested to recommend one for the competitive examination; and then the naval board appointed by the Academy, after examination, selects about fifteen of the boys; the others are dismissed, of course.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Does changing the names of these officers affect their salaries at all?

Mr. SCOFIELD. It does not in the least. They are now called first and second engineers; if this bill shall pass they will hereafter be called assistant and passed assistant engineers.

Mr. COX. I have received a letter from a gentleman connected with the Navy in this position, and he is in favor of the present designation of these engineers. He gives no reason except his love of precedent and of the service, but objects to any other name.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. COX. I am not; I have just looked at the letter.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I have here a recommendation of this change signed by nearly every engineer in the service—every one that could be reached. Gentlemen can see how large a package it makes. [Holding up a bundle of papers.] This is a specimen of their recommendation:

> I beg to express my approval of the proposed change of title from first assistant engineer to passed assistant engineer, and from second assistant engineer to assistant engineer.

The recommendation has been sent out to all the engineers in the service that could be reached, and they have invariably signed it, and expressed their approval of it. They cannot possibly object to it, because it is in their interest.

Mr. COX. I do not propose to object to the first section of this bill, but I would like to have some good reason given for it. I cannot see any reason for making the change. The engineer who corresponded with me seemed to take some pride in the office and in the name of the office, which had been so honorably filled by his predecessors, and which honor he seemed desirous of sharing.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman has probably misread the letter. The old title was what we propose to make it now. That was the name of honor from past services, and the engineers want to have it restored.

Mr. COX. I do not like to object to a bill that has been matured by a committee of this House.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. The practical effect of this bill will be to reduce by one-half the number of students educated as engineers.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It will, probably, unless we enlarge the number of the class. The Secretary has some little discretion about it. I ask for a vote.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GREEN BAY AND LAKE MICHIGAN SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask unanimous consent to take up and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. No. 447) extending the time for the completion of the Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal, in the State of Wisconsin. This bill has the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill was read. It provides that the time for the completion of the Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal be extended to the 10th day of April, 1876.

Mr. HOLMAN. As I stated on yesterday, inasmuch as this grant of land is for the purpose of creating a free canal for the whole country, I shall not object to its coming before the House now for consideration.

Mr. SAWYER. This bill is unanimously recommended by the Committee on the Public Lands.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAWYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXPORTATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BURCHARD. I rise to a privileged report, and report from the Committee on Ways and Means a bill to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, and amendatory of the act in relation thereto.

The SPEAKER. On what ground does the gentleman claim that this is a privileged report?

Mr. BURCHARD. That it is a tax bill, and also that it is very desirable that it should be passed now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to entertain the bill, but he cannot admit that it is a privileged report. The Chair does not know any rule under which it would be a privileged report.

Mr. BURCHARD. It is a bill affecting the revenue.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only calls attention to the matter because it may be a very important precedent in the order of business in the House.

Mr. BURCHARD. Of course, if there is any objection to its consideration at the present time, I do not claim that it is privileged for consideration. It is a bill, however, that has been examined by the Committee on Ways and Means, and I was instructed some time since to report it and ask its passage now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does not the rule require that this bill shall receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have it considered in the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object to that. I ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask that the bill be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No. 2081) was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. In regard to the bill just recommitted the Chair desires to say, that all measures relating to revenue or the imposing of taxes in any way, when they come from the Committee on Ways and Means, may be reported at any time for commitment, but for no other purpose.

TOPOGRAPHICAL SURVEY OF CAPITOL GROUNDS.

Mr. SESSIONS. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds Senate bill No. 360, making an appropriation for a topographical survey of the Capitol grounds and plans for improving the same; and ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

No objection being made, it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at half-past twelve o'clock. Reports are still in order from the Committee on the Judiciary.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2082) regulating the removal of causes from the State courts to the courts of the United States; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read.

The first section provides that in all cases where by law any party to an action pending in a State court has a right to remove the same into the circuit court of the United States, the application therefor, if made by the plaintiff, shall be made at the term of the State court to which the process by which the suit is commenced is made returnable; and if such application for removal is made by a defendant, the same shall be filed prior to the time when by law the plaintiff therein would be entitled to a judgment by default.

The second section provides that, in addition to the conditions now required by law of the party seeking such removal, he shall give good and sufficient surety that if he shall fail to enter said cause in such circuit court on the first day of its session next succeeding such removal, or if such cause shall by said circuit court be remanded to the State court by reason of not being entered by the party asking for the removal, or because the same was illegally or improperly ordered to be removed, he shall pay to the other party all such costs as are sustained by him by reason of such removal; and if the party procuring such order of removal of a cause shall not duly enter the same in such circuit court on the first day of its session, the opposing party may docket such cause in the circuit court with a certificate of the order removing said cause, from the clerk of the State court from which the same was removed; and said court shall thereupon order the same to be remanded to the State court; and in such case, and also whenever such circuit court shall remand any cause to a State court from which it was removed for the reason that the same was illegally or improperly removed, said circuit court shall proceed to tax the costs of the party not asking such removal, and the same shall be duly certified by the clerk thereof, and shall be recoverable upon the bond given on such removal.

The third section provides that in any suit hereafter to be brought in any State where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of $500, exclusive of costs, in which the plaintiff is a citizen of the State where the suit is commenced and the defendant or either of several defendants therein is an alien or a citizen of another State, such defendant may remove such cause from the State court to the circuit court of the United States next to be held in the district in which such cause is pending, by filing his application therefor and giving security as provided in the second section, and also filing an affidavit as provided in the act of March 2, 1867; and all the proceedings for and upon such application shall be as provided by said act.

The fourth section provides that the provisions of the act shall apply only to suits commenced after its passage.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. POLAND. I will hear what the amendment is.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is to strike out the third section of the bill.

Mr. POLAND. I consent that that amendment may be offered.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a word or two of explanation?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, the third section of this bill provides for bringing in the United States courts what I consider a new class of cases. At all events the question is in dispute; and the most that is claimed by those who think the third section ought to be passed is that the question has already been raised, and is now pending in the courts, to determine whether like cases are entitled to be brought in the United States courts. This bill provides that where one of the defendants is a resident of the State and the other a non-resident, in such cases the action may be brought in the United States courts; and if not originally brought there, but in a State court, it may be removed from the State court into the United States court upon an affidavit provided for by this bill, wherever one of the defendants is a non-resident of the State in which the action is brought. This provision is new, and it is one which it seems to me ought not to be adopted. In the first place the United States courts are now crowded with business, especially the Supreme Court. With five or six hundred cases pending when the courts adjourn, and the courts unable to dispose of the cases now pending, this provision will tend to increase the number of cases.

Again, if this provision be adopted, many cases may, by trick or fraud, be removed from the State courts on the ground that a defendant is a non-resident, when in fact he has simply been induced to consent to be a defendant in order that the case may be so removed. A person having an action against a single individual, a resident of the State, may, by connivance, by fraud, or arrangement with a non-resident, have him consent to have the action brought against him as one of the defendants, he making no objection; and then, on an affidavit that he is a non-resident, this defendant, acting in conspiracy and fraud with the plaintiff, may have the case transferred from the State court to the United States court.

Now, at a glance it can be seen this provision ought not to be adopted; and it is for that reason I have moved to strike out the third section of the act, because it not only crowds the courts, increasing the number of United States causes in the United States Supreme Court necessarily, but because it provides means whereby cases may be fraudulently removed from the State courts into the United States courts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Vermont yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the exact state of the provisions of this section is this. I believe it to be the law now. One judge of a circuit court has decided it to be the law. The question is now before the Supreme Court. It is intended to meet this evil. In order to prevent a citizen of another State going into the United States courts in many of the States, they insert in the writ the name of a resident. When they sue they insert in the writ, with the name of a non-resident, the name of a resident, so as to prevent, under the old judiciary act, suit being removed; and then when they get to trial they discontinue as to the resident and go on against the foreigner. In some States that makes a great hardship and great wrong, and takes away the jurisdiction of the United States courts.

The constitutional provision is familiar to everybody, but I will refer to it. The judiciary power extends to controversy between two or more States, between a State and citizen of another State, and between citizens of different States. Now, can it be said there is no controversy pending between two citizens of different States because the plaintiff has inserted the name, rightfully or wrongfully, of a citizen of the same State? Let me give you a case. A man comes from Illinois to Massachusetts, and the man from Massachusetts has a suit against him. He sues the citizen of Illinois and joins a Massachusetts man as defendant with him. Under the judiciary act that suit would be removed into the United States court, and when it comes to trial he can discontinue against the Massachusetts man and go on against the Illinois man. Now, no wrong is done to the Massachusetts man by either party to the controversy in taking him up to the United States court, because he is tried by a Massachusetts jury in the State of Massachusetts. He is tried in the Federal court, but he is tried by the same class of jurors as are in the State courts. But the Illinois man has not the right of appeal to the Supreme Court in case he is wronged by the Massachusetts law.

In the South, I am informed by gentlemen from there, when they want to get a northern man within the jurisdiction of the State court they insert a defendant to keep him out of the United States court.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts state if, under the present law in the case he supposes, where one of the defendants had been struck out, leaving the other a non-resident, the non-resident could move for a transfer of the suit to the United States court?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He could not.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. My question applies to the law as it now exists.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. He cannot. It used to be under the old law. This bill provides, in order to prevent the whole case from going there before the transfer is made, that the transfer shall be made at the time.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Under the old law?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Under the old law he could get out. Now we are making a provision to cut off the right of transfer at that time, so a man shall not go on litigating his case in the State court, and then turn around and transfer before final judgment against him. At any time now before final judgment it can be transferred when between the citizens of one State and the citizens of another State.

There is a similar provision in cases affecting ambassadors and other public ministers, &c. There the United States Supreme Court can have original jurisdiction. In cases of controversy, where we sue an ambassador by joining a citizen of the United States with him, do we thereby keep him out of the Supreme Court? Clearly not; but we should have some legislation to meet that case if any such should arise. This legislation is meant to meet that case. We simply provide that by the mere joining of another party with him you shall not keep him out of the United States court. Judge Shepley, of the first circuit, had decided, after very full argument by very able counsel, that this is the law now; and that case is before the Supreme Court. To remove those doubts and have a uniform law all over the United States this provision is inserted.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I ask that the section which it is moved to strike out may be again read.

The third section was again read.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. This is, in my judgment, a matter of extreme general importance, and I wish to state to the House frankly and fully the connection I have with the question before I proceed to make any remarks on it. I had considered this question as counsel for a party; but as this will have no bearing, so far as I am aware, upon that case, which has already gone nearly to its decision, that will not, I suppose, make it improper for me to state what view I entertain as a matter of law.

This section, under the clause in the Constitution which gives the Federal courts, the judicial power of the United States, jurisdiction over controversies between citizens of different States, proposes to give the power to one defendant who may be a party, or one of the component parts of a party, to the controversy, without the will of the other parties to the controversy, to remove the suit to the United States court. It is a very grave question whether that is consistent with the Constitution of the United States. Whether it was so consistent or not I had the honor of arguing, about a month ago, before the Supreme Court, with very distinguished counsel on the other side. An opinion, as I understand, will be delivered upon that question a week from next Monday by the court.

It has been stated truly that Judge Shepley, of the circuit court for New England, has decided under an existing law—the statute of 1867—that such removal could take place. No gentleman exceeds me in the respect I have for the professional ability and judicial character of that eminent gentleman. Stating that fact, however, is not stating to the House quite the whole of the judicial authority upon the subject; and I state to the House that Judge Shepley, of the first circuit court, is the only judge or tribunal in the United States, so far as by the most diligent search I can ascertain, that has so held; and the contrary has been held by the State courts of seven States, including my own State of Massachusetts, and by two of the circuit courts of the United States, the circuit court for New York, and the circuit court including Iowa.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman which are the other States of the seven to which he refers?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. New York, Massachusetts, Georgia, Alabama. I do not know that I can repeat them all. I think, Wisconsin and Iowa. I cannot undertake to say, and will not say, that the number is exactly seven. But I will say this to the House, that every State that has passed upon the question throughout the United States, it was conceded in the argument before the Supreme Court by counsel on both sides after the most diligent search, had decided the other way. Judge Dillon, of the circuit court of Iowa, and Judge Blatchford, holding the circuit court in New York, had also decided the other way. And up to the time of Judge Shepley's decision the judicial decisions were uniform. It would seem to me that under those circumstances, with the question awaiting immediate decision in the Supreme Court of the United States, it is hardly expedient for this House to take up this question, and that upon a bill which is not yet printed, which members ought to have an opportunity to study carefully, and which I have myself never seen, having only heard it read at the Clerk's desk. I think that such a bill ought not to be instantly or hastily passed. I do not even understand whether it receives the unanimous approbation of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It does not.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It is intimated to me that the proposition does not receive the unanimous approbation of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It does not.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. And therefore there seems to me the more reason that it should be more deliberately examined, and that a greater opportunity be allowed to consider it.

The history of the legislation on this subject is very brief. Under the first judiciary act of the country, which provided that the United States courts should have jurisdiction of suits between citizens of different States—using the word "suits," and not "controversies"—all the Federal courts decided that every party, plaintiff or defendant, must be competent to sue or be sued by all the parties opposing him; that is, that they must be all citizens of different States.

Mr. McCRARY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether the decision was based upon the Constitution or the judiciary act itself?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Upon the judiciary act only. The only point that would involve the Constitution would be whether the word "controversies" in the Constitution and the word "suits" in the judiciary act were intended to be equivalent to each other, and were so used by the men who, having participated in the framing of the Constitution, proceeded to pass the general laws necessary to carry its general policy into effect.

I pass, as not having anything to do with the question, the various acts that have been passed in relation to jurisdiction derived from the subject-matter by parties as officers of the United States, on matters done and performed on behalf of the United States; for instance, in regard to the Pacific Railroad and other corporations created by the United States, which stand on an entirely different ground. But Congress, in 1866, undertook to provide for the removal of causes where one defendant only was a citizen of a different State and where all were not. A defendant who was a citizen of a different State from the plaintiff might remove the cause, provided the case was capable of division, so that the controversy might be carried on against him, leaving the rest of the suit in the State courts. I suppose at the time that was passed that was considered to be as far as it could be constitutionally done.

In 1867 an act was passed to enable the plaintiff to remove the suit, which act was open to the objection that my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] has stated very forcibly, that the plaintiff could remove it at any time. I understand this bill proposes to limit that so that the removal shall be done seasonably, and with that I entirely concur. The object of that statute was apparently to enable the plaintiff to remove the suit; for the language used was that either party, the plaintiff or the defendant, being non-resident, could remove the suit.

Mr. POLAND. I should be very glad to yield longer to my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] but this is our last morning hour, and one-half of it is gone, and we have a great press of business.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move that the bill be printed and recommitted.

Mr. POLAND. I consent to that.

The SPEAKER. That will be done if there is no objection.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I enter the motion to reconsider the recommittal. And now I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Can a motion be made to reconsider a vote that has not yet been passed by the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] who makes the motion to reconsider has the floor; and, if he desires, he can proceed to debate it, because that motion is as broad as the original motion. If he yields the floor, then a motion can be made to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. POTTER. I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I did not understand that the motion to recommit was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair heard no objection.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If I have the floor I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. WHITE.]

The SPEAKER. For what purpose?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To report some bills from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] who occupied the floor by leave of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] who reported the bill, moved that it be printed and recommitted. To that motion the Chair heard no objection. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. BUTLER,] said that he entered a motion to reconsider that vote. The gentleman is still upon the floor; no business has intervened; and the gentleman cannot pass to or yield for the consideration of any other business so as to deprive any other gentleman of the opportunity to test the sense of the House by moving to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The reason why I entered the motion to reconsider was that my colleague [Mr. E. R. HOAR] had said that he had not had time to examine this bill. I was quite content that it should be recommitted and printed, in order that the House might have an opportunity to examine it. But this is our difficulty: if this bill shall pass out of our control by a motion to recommit, and that motion be reconsidered and tabled, we may never be able to get it up again. In that way we will be consenting to kill the bill on one motion. I therefore entered the motion to reconsider, in order that hereafter I might have the opportunity to bring it again before the House.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman entered the motion to reconsider, the Chair understood that there was general consent all around to the arrangement, and that would leave the bill in the control of the gentleman to bring it up hereafter.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I certainly should not object to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair said that he heard no objection to it.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It is to be hoped that fair notice will be given when it is to be called up.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Can a bill be printed pending a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; the motion to reconsider applies to the recommitment. The Chair will state, for the information of the House, that after the motion to recommit had been agreed to, had some other gentleman been recognized, and then he had yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts to enable him to enter the motion to reconsider, that could not have been followed by a motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. But no business whatever intervening, and the motion to reconsider being pending, any gentleman had the right to move to lay the motion on the table before the House proceeded to the consideration of any other business. But the Chair understood that it was generally agreed that the motion to reconsider might be entered in the Journal.

Mr. POTTER. I consider the most of this bill as valuable, all except the third section. I think the third section is very dangerous. Under the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, [Mr. BUTLER,] that under the motion to reconsider the recommitment he will bring this bill again before the House at some time when it can be fully considered, I will withdraw the motion to lay it on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider will be entered upon the Journal.

PRINTING THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. There is a great demand for the Senate bankrupt bill, and all the copies heretofore printed being entirely exhausted, I ask unanimous consent that it may be reprinted.

No objection was made, and it was ordered accordingly.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. WHITE,] my colleague on the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 225) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish the western judicial district of North Carolina."

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

The bill was read. It provides that section 8 of the act of June 4, 1872, entitled "An act to establish the western judicial district of North Carolina," be amended, by adding thereto the following: "There shall also be appointed a marshal of the United States for said western district of North Carolina, who shall receive such fees and compensation, and exercise such powers and perform such duties, as are fixed and enjoined by law."

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make the point of order that this bill, containing an appropriation, must go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point; the bill is so referred.

CONGRESSMEN AT LARGE FOR ALABAMA.

Mr. WHITE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 886) to provide for the election of Congressmen at Large for the State of Alabama.

The bill was read. It provides that the two additional Representatives to Congress allowed to the State of Alabama according to the apportionment under the ninth census may be elected by the State at large, and the other Representatives to which the State is entitled by the districts as now prescribed by law in said State, unless the General Assembly of Alabama shall otherwise provide before the time fixed by law for the election for Representatives to Congress from said State.

Mr. WHITE. In explanation of this bill, I will state that by the apportionment act of the last Congress the State of Alabama was allowed two additional Representatives; and provision was made for their election in the State at large for the Forty-third Congress. Since that time the Legislature of Alabama, because of the fact that one branch is democratic while the other is republican, has been unable to redistrict the State. The districts remain as they were, being only six in number; and without the passage of such a bill as this by Congress the State will be deprived of two Representatives that we have been by law declared entitled to.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHITE] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. I believe the gentleman is now a member at large from the State of Alabama?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. Was not the gentleman elected under the apportionment act of the last Congress?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. Then what is the necessity for the passage of another law?

Mr. WHITE. Because the law of the last Congress provided for the election of Representatives at large to the Forty-third Congress only. Under the ninth census Alabama is entitled to eight Representatives; but she has only six districts. The State was not redistricted at the last session of the General Assembly. This bill simply provides for an election for Representatives at large in the next Congress, thus giving the State the full number to which she is entitled.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, the existing law requires that the States shall be redistricted according to population. The difficulty with Alabama is, that being entitled to two more Representatives than she has districts, she will not redistrict the State and make districts for new members. The law of the last Congress made provision only for the election of members at large to the present Congress, in order, if I understand the policy, to compel the States to redistrict so that the districts might be nearly equal in population. If a State will not do this I am unable to see why she should not remain without the additional representation.

Mr. WHITE. The difficulty in the case arises from the fact that one branch of the Legislature is democratic and the other republican. The matter was brought to the attention of the General Assembly, and action upon it urged by the governor; but these two bodies have been unable to agree. The question now submitted to the House is whether in consequence of this failure to agree, and when there is no reasonable prospect of agreement, the State of Alabama shall be deprived in the next Congress of a part of the representation to which she is under the law entitled.

Mr. MAYNARD. Inasmuch as the Legislature of Alabama is unable to redistrict the State by its own action, would it not be better to bring in a bill to redistrict the State by act of Congress, so that there may be one Representative for each district?

Mr. WHITE. I do not know that that would be objected to; but no proposition of that kind is before the House. No body of men and no one man can reasonably be charged with the responsibility for this failure to redistrict the State.

Mr. BROMBERG. I wish to ask my colleague one question. How many Legislatures have had this question under consideration already?

Mr. WHITE. Only one.

Mr. BROMBERG. It has been under consideration at three different sessions. When I was in the senate of that State this very question was under consideration.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why did you not redistrict?

Mr. BROMBERG. I was not on the committee appointed for that purpose; but the question was before us. Since then the Legislature has met twice; yet the two branches cannot agree. It is evident that somebody wants to gerrymander.

Mr. HAYS. Allow me to ask the gentleman how long the State of Alabama has been entitled to eight Representatives?

Mr. BROMBERG. I only know that when I sat in the senate of the State in 1872 the question of redistricting the State was then already before us.

Mr. HAYS. The State was not then entitled to these additional Representatives.

Mr. WHITE. The question could not possibly have been before the senate at that time, because the State was not then entitled to this additional representation.

Mr. BROMBERG. They were not able to agree then, and they have never been able to agree since. If we are to wait until some one party gets the control of that Legislature we shall always have these two Congressmen at large, because the State of Alabama is so constituted that parties will always be almost equally divided in that Legislature. Democrats and republicans will wait in vain if they expect to wait until one party or the other shall get control of the Legislature and fix up the districts to suit themselves. They must agree to some compromise; they must settle upon some fair and impartial distribution of the districts.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BROMBERG] want his State to be deprived of part of its representation on this floor?

Mr. BROMBERG. I want the people of my State represented in a proper way. I do not want to have certain districts "left out in the cold."

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. If the State will not act, why should the gentleman object to the regulation of the matter by Congress?

Mr. BROMBERG. Because I think the Legislature should be compelled to come to some agreement.

Mr. WHITE. I do not yield any further. I call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CREDITORS OF THE REPUBLIC OF TEXAS.

Mr. WHITE also, from the same committee, reported back a joint resolution (H. R. No. 9) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay over to the State of Texas the balance remaining of the fund appropriated by the acts of September 9, 1850, and February 28, 1855, for the payment of the creditors of the late republic of Texas, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HERNDON. I do not think the point of order is well taken. This does not propose the appropriation of any money. I hope the gentleman will allow me to make a short statement. I believe the Chair will see that it is not subject to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. On what ground is it not subject to the point of order?

Mr. HERNDON. It is upon this ground. The amount sought to be refunded to the State of Texas was specified by the appropriation made on the 28th day of February, 1855, and that sum has remained in the Treasury ever since. The limitation upon it has ceased, and this is simply to refund that amount to the State of Texas. It is already in the Treasury, and set apart for this very purpose.

The SPEAKER. The rule reads, "or authorizes the payment out of an appropriation already made." This would come certainly under that provision.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. WHITE also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 107) for the better organization of the district courts of the United States within the State of Louisiana, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I make the point of order against that bill.

The SPEAKER. It provides for a new office, and therefore for a salary, and must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It will be so referred.

DEBTS CONTRACTED BEFORE THE WAR.

Mr. WHITE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a substitute for House bill No. 525, House joint resolution No. 11, and House joint resolution No. 18, repealing certain laws and parts of laws therein mentioned, and to move that the substitute be printed and recommitted, with leave to the committee to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. This bill has not the proper title. The title indicates nothing at all.

Mr. WHITE. I am instructed to report back a substitute for a certain bill and joint resolutions of the House, to repeal certain laws and parts of laws.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be received as an original bill, but it should have a title to state exactly what the bill provides.

Mr. WHITE. I will report it as an original bill (H. R. No. 2083) providing for paying the debts and bounties upon contracts made and for services rendered previous to the 14th of April, 1861, by persons engaged in the rebellion.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the bill be printed and recommitted, with leave to the committee to report at any time.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would the effect be, if we give leave to the committee to report at any time, to make this a special order whenever the committee shall choose to bring it up on their own motion?

The SPEAKER. It will; but it requires unanimous consent. The right to report at any time carries with it the right to consider at any time.

Mr. MAYNARD. Instead of granting leave to the committee to report at any time, had not the committee better fix some time when it will bring it up for consideration?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to granting leave to the committee to report at any time?

Mr. COX. If they report it back with a different title, would it affect the motion?

The SPEAKER. It would not. Is there objection?

Mr. COBURN. I object. Let it come up in its regular order.

The bill was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

NORTHERN DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. CESSNA, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 541) to provide for a district and circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Pennsylvania, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. NEGLEY. I make the point of order against the bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken, and the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

FEES OF UNITED STATES MARSHALS.

Mr. CESSNA also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 780) requiring the United States marshals and clerks of the United States circuit and district courts, who have received fees and emoluments in excess of their legal compensation, to deposit the same with the Treasurer of the United States, with a substitute.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

The United States marshals and clerks of the United States circuit and district courts of the several States and Territories be, and they are hereby, directed to forward without delay to the Secretary of the Treasury a report of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and all other proceedings in equity and chancery growing out of the same, with the cost thereof; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to prepare such blank forms for this purpose as will enable them to make said report full and uniform.

SEC. 2. That where the said reports show or where it appears that any of said marshals or clerks have received fees and emoluments of their respective offices, of every name and character, in excess of their maximum compensation as provided by law, and have failed to deposit the same, the Secretary of the Treasury, through the Department of Justice, shall require them to immediately deposit the said excess in the Treasury of the United States; and for this purpose the Secretary may designate two or more suitable employés of the Treasury Department as special agents to examine the books, accounts, and reports of said officers, which agents shall receive for such extra services such compensation as the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem just and proper, payable out of the fees and emoluments received or collected: Provided however, That no employé, for such services and as regular salary, shall receive more than $5,000 in a period of one year.

SEC. 3. That in case any clerk or marshal shall neglect or refuse to deposit any such excess of fees and emoluments as herein directed, the Secretary of the Treasury, through the Department of Justice, shall proceed to collect such excess by suit upon the official bond of such officer, or by any other process which he may deem most advisable.

SEC. 4. That any officer who shall neglect or refuse to deposit with the Treasurer of the United States any excess of fees and emoluments of office by him received over and above the maximum allowed by law, shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement of the money so withheld, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment and hard labor for a term not less than one year, nor more than ten years, or by fine of not less than $1,000, nor more than the amount embezzled, when the sum exceeds $1,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. CESSNA. If there is no objection raised to the consideration and passage of the bill I will ask the previous question. But if any gentleman desires to oppose it, or to make any inquiry in regard to it, I am willing to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CESSNA. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPEER. The bill reported by my colleague covers, perhaps, in the main, the ground I had in view in introducing the resolution of instructions to the Judiciary Committee on Monday last. It appears by the last report of the Attorney-General that there are certain clerks of United States courts that have persistently refused to make return of the amount of fees and perquisites that come into their hands in pursuance of law. And I am credibly informed that the fees and perquisites of some of the clerks amount to the enormous sum of $100,000 annually. The fees are most enormous. Under the existing laws they are required to report the amounts of these fees and perquisites to the Attorney-General, but they have refused to do so, and he has no authority under the law at present to compel them. He states in his report that he has made application to the judges of the circuits or districts in which these defaulting officers reside, and that he has had no response from them, while he has not the authority to compel them to obey the law.

The bill of my colleague goes in the right direction so far as it does go. I did not catch from the reading of it whether it applies to those officers who are now in default.

Mr. CESSNA. The bill does apply to all officers in default; but does not punish them, as that would be ex post facto legislation.

Mr. SPEER. Does it require them to make returns?

Mr. CESSNA. Yes, sir. The bill directs that all in default shall be proceeded against for collection, and that the punishment shall be added as an infliction or penalty for all cases that may arise hereafter.

As the morning hour is almost expired, I must insist on calling the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the substitute was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CESSNA moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CESSNA. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to move that they be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 32, and also the resolution introduced by my colleague, [Mr. SPEER,] directing the committee on the Judiciary to investigate the cause of failure of certain clerks of courts to pay excess of fees into their respective courts. They embrace the same subject-matter as that of the bill just passed. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and resolution I have named, and that the same be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL JUDICIAL DISTRICT IN NEW YORK.

Mr. POTTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, as a substitute for the bill H. R. No. 520, a bill (H. R. No. 2083) to establish an additional judicial district in the State of New York, and to make further provisions in relation to the courts of the United States in the said State; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. NEGLEY. I make the point of order on that bill that it contains an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is good, and the bill goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

INDIANA JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1998) to divide the State of Indiana into two judicial districts, and to provide for the holding of courts of the United States therein; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

CLERKS OF UNITED STATES COURTS IN INDIANA.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill H. R. No. 1235, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute, being a bill (H. R. No. 2084) to provide for the appointment of clerks for the circuit and district courts of the United States held at New Albany and Evansville, in the district of Indiana, was received, and read a first and second time.

The bill provides that clerks shall be appointed for the circuit and district courts of the United States held at New Albany and Evansville, in the district of Indiana, in like manner and subject to the same duties and responsibilities that other clerks are subject to in other independent districts; the deputy clerks at said places shall perform the duties of the offices, respectively, till clerks are duly appointed and qualified. The bill further provides that the clerks so appointed shall be entitled to receive, as compensation for their services, the fees now allowed by law arising out of the business of said courts, and no other compensation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF MONTICELLO.

Mr. JEWETT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1250) to authorize the purchase of Monticello, formerly the homestead of Thomas Jefferson; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS IN MANDAMUS.

Mr. JEWETT, from the same committee, also reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1273) to regulate proceedings in mandamus.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that in all proceedings in mandamus in any of the courts of the United States, wherein any officer of the United States is made a party defendant, but who may die, resign, or be removed from office before the final determination of such proceedings, the same may be continued in the name of his successor in said office, and such proceedings may be had as in case of the death of a party defendant during the pending of a suit at law in the proper court; and said proceedings in mandamus shall proceed to a hearing at the same term, unless for good cause shown the court shall continue the case, and if a peremptory writ shall be awarded, the same shall and may be directed to any successor in office to such person who may have so resigned, been removed, or died. The second section provides that the act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the second section of this bill will be stricken out. All laws take effect from and after their passage, unless otherwise specified. It is not necessary to put in that section.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The second section should be stricken out. There is no objection to that motion, as that section is unnecessary.

The motion to strike out the second section was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JEWETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The morning hour has now expired, and with it expires the second morning hour to which the Committee on the Judiciary are entitled. There are before our committee two very important bills: one for the distribution of the Geneva award, and the other the bankrupt bill with the Senate amendments. The committee, on account of their patient hearing of the voluminous arguments of those interested in the Geneva award, have not yet been able to come to any determination upon the bill. It may be months before we shall be again called in our regular order, and the claimants are already long kept out of their money. I ask unanimous consent of the House that, in regard to the Geneva award bill and the bankrupt bill, the Committee on the Judiciary have leave to report at any time; and I pledge myself to the House for the committee that we will not antagonize any special order.

Mr. POTTER. And that the House shall have due notice of the purpose of the committee to report those bills.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly; we will give due notice to the House. We want those bills fully discussed.

Mr. POTTER. There is no other way by which those bills can be considered by the House, and they are very important.

Mr. DAWES. There is no objection to it, I suppose.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I object to any such order, at least in regard to the Geneva award bill.

Mr. DEWITT. Should not that bill be considered first in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why?

Mr. DEWITT. It proposes to take money out of the Treasury that is now there.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not think it can be regarded as an appropriation bill; but the point of order, if good, can be made when reported.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. I think the money is safe where it is, and we can afford to let it remain there a little longer. I am not in a hurry.

Mr. POTTER. The gentleman may not be in a hurry; but there is such a thing as justice.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to say that the Geneva award bill will probably go, I think it is almost certain to go, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, when reported.

Mr. W. R. ROBERTS. What objection has the gentleman to allowing that bill to take its regular course?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Because we will not be called again for two months at least, if then.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It will not make much difference whether we are called or not. During the last Congress some committees were not able to report. I have a bill now which I carried through the last Congress without being able to report it, although I was ordered to report it to the House. Other matters of no importance are reported upon, however.

Mr. PACKER. I call for the regular order of business, and that the House now proceed to consider the special order, being House bill No. 825, providing for the free distribution of printed matter.

Mr. MAYNARD. If in order, I desire to move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] is a special order in the House at the hour of half-past one, to the exclusion of all other orders except appropriation bills.

Mr. DAWES. A special order in the House; I suppose we can go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The order is that the House will consider it to the exclusion of all other orders except appropriation bills.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] should not press his bill, I suppose we can go into Committee of the Whole on the tax bill.

Mr. PACKER. A number of gentlemen desire to speak on the bill, and we will soon have it out of the way of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution agreed to by the House in regard to the post-office bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be authorized to report House bill No. 825, providing for the free distribution of printed matter, &c., on Thursday, February 12, and that it be made the special order for that day at half-past one o'clock, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, excepting the regular appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. Nothing is excepted but general appropriation bills.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not within the power of a majority of the House, if they so incline, to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. This order was made under a suspension of the rules, two-thirds voting therefor.

Mr. MAYNARD. So I understand; but is the effect of the order——

The SPEAKER. That order takes away the power of the House to go into Committee of the Whole upon anything except general appropriation bills until this question is disposed of.

Mr. MAYNARD. I beg to say that I intended to ask the House to-day to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the free banking bill; but under the ruling just made by the Chair, I am precluded from submitting that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed when the gentleman from Tennessee gave his notice to that effect that this bill would be disposed of before this time.

Mr. MAYNARD. When this bill is out of the way, I shall still endeavor to bring to the attention of the House the bill I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman at the first practicable moment.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was presented by Mr. BABCOCK, one of his secretaries.

CHANNEL AT THE MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of marine insurance companies, shippers, ship-owners, pilots, underwriters, and the Tow-boat Association of New Orleans, against military interference with the channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

TRANSMISSION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, a bill (H. R. No. 825) to provide for the distribution of public documents printed by the authority of Congress, and of seeds furnished by the Agricultural Department, for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of weekly newspapers by mail within the county where published. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has twenty-five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Iowa gave a large part of his time to a gentleman speaking on the opposite side of the question, I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed his full hour.

Mr. KASSON. I hope I shall not require a full hour, though I may need a few moments more than the time to which I am entitled.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I ask that the gentleman may be allowed so much time as he needs to complete his remarks.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has any limit been fixed to this debate?

The SPEAKER. There has not.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is the condition of the bill in regard to the possibility of amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows nothing in regard to the disposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] in regard to the offering of amendments.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is the motion to recommit pending?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ARCHER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] yields to me that I may state that my colleague, Mr. WILSON, has been detained from the House for several days by serious sickness.

Mr. TYNER. I desire to say that I shall not object to an extension of the time of the gentleman from Iowa, even to the limit of one hour, if he shall occupy all the time himself; but if he is disposed to "farm out" any portion I shall object to the extension.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall be quite content with whatever the House may desire in the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana suggests that he has no objection to an extension of time to the gentleman from Iowa for his own use, but he objects to granting additional time to be "farmed out."

Mr. KASSON. I had not proposed to "farm out" any portion of my time except to two or three gentlemen who ask an opportunity to give notice of propositions they intended to make.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman with the limitation stated.

Mr. KASSON. By reason of the declaration of the chairman of the committee yesterday, that he did not feel at liberty to allow me to offer as a substitute a bill which I have introduced and which has been referred to the committee, I must ask now, in order to show the point in part to which I shall speak, that the Clerk read as a part of my remarks the bill (H. R. No. 1863) which I shall offer as a substitute whenever it may be in order. I have made two or three amendments of the text of the bill as referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill providing for the sale and distribution of public documents, and authorizing the free delivery of newspapers through the mails in the counties of publication.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter all extra copies, beyond the usual number printed, of all reports and documents published by order of Congress, or of either House thereof, shall be sold and disposed of in the manner provided by this act.

SEC. 2. That the price of the Agricultural Report and of the volume known as Abridgment of the President's Message and Accompanying Documents shall be twenty-five cents for each volume; and of all other volumes and documents the price shall be the actual cost of the paper and binding of the same, which shall be certified to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, respectively, by the Congressional Printer, and the price shall be printed on such volume or document.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate, or of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, upon payment to him of the price of any such volume or document, to cause the same to be addressed by mail or delivered at the Capitol, as requested; and when sent by mail within the United States no additional charge shall be made for postage thereon; but the same shall be stamped by the officer transmitting the same in the manner to be provided by the Postmaster-General. And all moneys so received by either of said officers shall be by him paid monthly into the Treasury of the United States, and placed to the account of public printing, and an annual report thereof shall be made to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 4. That each of said officers of the Senate and House of Representatives shall open an account with each class of said extra volumes and documents so subject to sale, showing the entire number to be disposed of, and the number each day for which he shall have received the price, and the total receipts of that day therefor; and all deliveries thereof shall be made upon his order addressed to the officer of the respective Houses in charge of such books and documents, who shall preserve the same, subject to the examination of the Committee on Accounts of the respective Houses, who shall compare the same from time to time with the accounts of the Sergeant-at-Arms and of the Secretary of the Senate respectively.

SEC. 5. That in all cases where Congress shall not have otherwise regulated the number of extra copies of any such book or document to be printed, the Committees on Printing of the two Houses shall, as a joint committee, determine the number in their judgment needed to supply the public demand therefor under the provisions of this act; and the Congressional Printer, being notified thereof, shall provide and deliver the number so determined in manner as shall be directed by said joint committee: Provided, That no new edition shall be ordered by said committee which shall require further expense for composition, but additional copies may be ordered from stereotype plates.

SEC. 6. That from and after the beginning of the postal quarter next following the approval of this act, all weekly newspapers may be delivered free of postal charges through the post-offices and mails within the county where, at least, two pages thereof are printed, and the same are published; but post-office carriers shall not be required to distribute such papers unless postage shall have been paid thereon at the usual rates.

SEC. 7. That any person who shall knowingly, and with intent to defraud the Government of the United States, make, use, or cause to be used, any of the said stamps, or any imitation of the stamp herein authorized to be prepared and used for any other purpose, or in any other manner than as is hereinbefore authorized, shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment not less than three months nor more than twelve months, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. MONROE. The gentleman from Iowa yields two minutes to me, that I may offer an amendment and say a word or two in regard to it. I desire to move to amend the bill by striking out sections 1, 2, and 4.

Mr. Speaker, the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads looks to the future. It proposes to continue the large and expensive system of public printing which has existed in the past. Now, the amendment which I offer proposes to strike out all the sections which look to that object. I have always had a serious difficulty in my own mind in regard to this great expense. I notice that gentlemen who have spoken in favor of this measure have asked us to vote to continue this expenditure in the interest of the people. Now, sir, that is just the point that I would like to have explained. My difficulty in regard to this great mass of public printing has always been just here: I have always had a difficulty in seeing how it is for the interest of the people. I hope some gentleman who is to follow me will explain this point. I suppose we never send of any of these public documents to our congressional districts more than one book to about twenty-five or thirty tax-payers. That is my recollection of an estimate I once made in regard to one of the reports. And the result is, that when this very small portion of tax-payers receive the volumes, members of Congress get large numbers of letters from other tax-payers complaining of this inequality. I hope some gentleman who is friendly to the measure will show us how this great inequality can be continued in the interest of the whole body of the tax-payers.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman from Iowa yields to me the same length of time, simply to indicate an amendment which I shall offer when I have opportunity. It is in the eleventh line of the bill, page 2. In offering it I will simply say that I shall vote against the whole of this bill except the third section, which provides for the free transmission of weekly papers in the county where they are published, and newspaper exchanges. I shall vote against the whole of this bill, except the third section, which provides for the transmission of weekly papers in the county where published, and newspaper exchanges free. I will support that, but all the balance I intend to vote against, in accordance with the pledge the republican party gave in convention in Philadelphia in 1872, to abolish the franking privilege and to keep it abolished. If it is to pass, I propose in the eleventh line to strike out the word "charge," where it provides all these documents, having been properly stamped, shall pass through the mails "without charge"—I propose to strike out the word "charge," and in lieu thereof to insert "without prepayment of postage, but the amount thereof shall be stamped on the wrapper and paid by the person receiving the same."

Mr. KASSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House first to the bill which is offered as a substitute for the bill reported by the committee, and I should hardly ask the indulgence of the House on this question, or desire to antagonize the bill reported by the committee, except for the fact of my personal and official familiarity with the working of the old franking system; and also from my belief that it is important in this instance, as in all others, that the House should shape its legislation upon some principle of action instead of the mere expediency of the hour. The great danger of congressional legislation to-day is in the fact that in the hurry and crowd of business, we often utterly fail to look back to the first principles of legislation, upon which every bill should depend, so as to bear the test of examination, as a precedent for the future as well as an expedient for the present.

We are told to-day there are accumulated documents in the basement of this Capitol. If that be so, it is not by virtue of any resolution which has passed this Congress at the present session. It is not by virtue of the old accumulations, for they, by car-loads and train-loads, were sent off before the 1st of July last.

Now, sir, there are two systems, one of which, as you accept one principle or the other, should be adopted in respect to public documents furnished by order of the Government. One of these principles is to allow every citizen of every political party of the United States an equal right to possess himself of any public document which gives information of the proceedings of any branch of his Government. Nobody proposes to give away the records of the transactions of the Supreme Court and distribute them among the people as the acts of one of the sovereign branches of this Government. Nobody proposes to give away any proceedings except those connected with the political departments.

This bill which I have offered as a substitute takes the only ground which is equal and just to the people in the distribution of public documents; that is, to furnish them at such prices as bring them within the range of the mass of the people of the country and to furnish them upon identically the same terms to the entire community. That is a principle which will stand the test of examination. It is a principle recognized in every civilized and free government. There is not a public document published to-day by order of the Parliament of England which is not on sale at a low price, less than the cost of it, to all the public who may desire it. But the Congress of the United States heretofore has taken different ground until the period of the Forty-second Congress. There is nobody in England, not even the Queen of England herself, who is authorized to have an advantage over a private citizen in her communications passing through the postal service of that country.

We began in the early history of this country by giving governors of States the right to frank public documents and by giving Senators and Representatives the right to frank letters and documents not weighing over two ounces. Members and Senators have seen fit to let this franking privilege grow, until now you send not only two ounces of mail matter, but you send whole volumes, whole editions of books, car-loads of books, in many of which the people take no more interest than they do in old newspapers which lie about their rooms.

It is characteristic of special privileges, and it is characteristic of perquisites, to grow by that they feed on. If we were to look into the bosoms of members here—if we had a psychoscope, and could sound the moral sense of members, and I might say their political sense, I think you would find that the interest of the public in obtaining any of the documents of Congress was not the only motive which inspires members to vote for a bill like this. It belongs, Mr. Speaker, to that class of subsidies, to that interest of perquisites, which it is the duty of all reformers to resist and reduce to the utmost possible extent.

Now, sir, there is, as I have said, a choice of but two principles of action; and I want neither of them compromised in this House. One of those is represented, not by the bill of the committee, but by the suggested amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] and that is to restore the franking privilege, pure, simple, and absolute, on the ground that communications of all sorts between the representatives and the people should be as free and unobstructed as possible. And, on the other hand, antagonized to that is the principle that every citizen, irrespective of his standing as a favorite with a Senator or Member, enabling him to have a book given to him and transported free, should have an equal right to go or send his money to the place of deposit and obtain any document he desires. Between these two principles there should be no compromise. The report of the committee is an attempt to compromise those two principles, and deals with the two elements in a mixed way that seems to yield in part to the public objection to the restoration of the franking privilege, and at the same time restores it to a degree that is as obnoxious as possible to any right principle of action.

I submit therefore that if gentlemen shape their votes on this occasion with reference to any just principle of public action they must do one thing or the other. They must restore the franking privilege fully, on written as well as printed communications, with the people, or they must put the people on equal terms to obtain access to all those public documents which are printed by Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after considering the principle of our action, let us look at the details of the bill.

I will ask you first to look at the mode of operation, on the principle of sale. We have two documents that are more largely circulated than any other. They are the Agricultural Report, of which we have ordered heretofore two hundred and fifty thousand extra copies annually, and the Abridgment of the President's Message and Accompanying Documents, a volume of nearly the same size.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. We have ordered in all five hundred thousand copies of the Agricultural Report for two years.

Mr. KASSON. I spoke of the number per annum. The number for two years is over five hundred thousand; for one year two hundred and fifty-five thousand. I do not remember the exact number we have been in the habit of ordering of the abridged edition of the President's Message and Accompanying Documents. I think we ordered of those between thirty and forty thousand copies.

Now, sir, we have just these two great documents most demanded by the people, one with reference to the development of the interest of agriculture, and the other giving information to the people of the United States on the condition of their Government. Those two volumes this bill proposes to make accessible to everybody who desires to read them. The man who wishes them in his library for reference, or to read them, will do as people are daily doing now—will send to the disbursing officer, or to us, twenty-five cents, a convenient sum to remit so as to get possession of those documents, and that will be paid into the Treasury.

But, sir, if we do not allow them to be thus exposed equally to purchase by any citizen of the community; if we retain the power of distribution and send them to our own friends, political or personal, only those who have the good fortune to have political or personal friends in Congress will get them. And, if one not so favored is not permitted to go and buy even at the full price; if we absorb all into our possession, we practically say that no man in the United States shall have knowledge, or if you so please to term it, "information," in regard to public affairs, except just so far as we, the members of Congress, will allow him to have it.

What is the effect of it? Why it is simply this: that in the republican districts, representing two-thirds of the United States, but a mere fraction of the political opponents of our party are likely to get possession of this information. And yet they are the very men who, as much as any others, if not more than any others, need the information necessary to enable them to criticise the party in power and its public action. And in the democratic districts the gentlemen on the other side of the House know that they want to oblige their own supporters, and that the republicans in their district have a very small share of what you please to term the favors of the Government or of the members of Congress. I say, sir, that this cannot be defended upon any principle except that of subsidies or of perquisites of members of Congress.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman to say that he thinks it would be more equitable to allow these reports to be sold, as they are paid for out of the common fund. I ask the gentleman from Iowa if he intends to defend a measure upon this floor that will secure the publication of enough volumes of these Agricultural Reports to supply every citizen of the United States with one at twenty-five cents?

Mr. KASSON. I answer the gentleman emphatically that we do want to supply every citizen who thinks the document worth twenty-five cents, and demands a copy. Now we stereotype these documents of which I have spoken and some others.

The entire cost of composition is incurred by printing the few copies that we call "the regular number." Consequently, if extra copies are printed, no expense is incurred except that for the paper and press-work, and for binding, if they are bound; therefore, that is all which you have to consider as the cost of the document to the public. This bill provides that extra copies may be printed from the stereotyped plates of any public document until the public demand is satisfied, and furnished to the public at the actual cost, which will be comparatively small for the reason I have stated.

Mr. SPEER. Does the printing of the Agricultural Report cost only twenty-five cents? Is not the actual cost sixty-three cents?

Mr. KASSON. I have different statements in regard to that. One is that the cost is a little over forty cents, and the other is that it is sixty cents. The cost varies with the size of the document, and also depends upon the extent of the edition.

Mr. SPEER. Then why sell it for twenty-five cents?

Mr. KASSON. I have given the cost, including the composition, which is the great element of cost in the beginning. When you have incurred the expense of composition by printing one single copy, or by printing what we call the regular number, then the cost of composition is out of the calculation in regard to the number ordered to be printed for the use of the people. That is enough to justify the fixing of the price at twenty-five cents. But there is another reason, and that is to fix the price at a sum which will be convenient for transmission, and which will make the document accessible to the people without imposing a burden upon them. It is designed to approximate the cost, and also to fix a sum convenient for remittance, and to put the document, if valuable, within the reach of every citizen who may desire it. So much in regard to the question of cost and the manner and mode of distribution.

The second section of the bill has also a provision in it that the price is to be printed upon every document, so that the public may know it without special inquiry.

Mr. DONNAN. Allow me to correct my colleague [Mr. KASSON] in regard to the cost of the Agricultural Report. The last official report of the Public Printer shows that of the twelve hundred extra copies ordered by the Senate, the cost barely for printing, dry-pressing, folding, &c., with binding, amounted to a little upward of $834. That would make it about sixty cents per copy, aside from the cost of composition, which is incurred, as my colleague has said, in the printing of the regular number.

Mr. KASSON. The cost may be more or less. The object of this bill, as I have said, is to make these documents accessible to the people, and accessible at less than cost to all people who are interested in them. The rule prevails in other countries, and I think it is a good principle to be followed in this.

In the third section I provide for the officers who are to receive this money for the documents, and who are the disbursing officers of the two Houses. I want to make it easy for the citizen to address his member for a document (or the officer if he chooses) and to send to him the price of it, and he will then turn it over to the proper officer, who will send the document and credit the money, to be paid at stated periods into the Treasury. The labor which distracts us so much from the business for which we are mainly sent here is thus put upon the working officers of the two Houses, and with equal advantage to the people.

The fourth section relates to keeping the accounts.

The fifth section relates to the printing of extra copies of documents that are stereotyped, by order of the Joint Committee on Printing, until the public demand is satisfied.

The sixth section is the same in substance with that of the bill reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, providing for the free circulation, in the counties of publication, of weekly newspapers.

Mr. HURLBUT. Will the gentleman explain on what principle he permits county newspapers, and not others, to exercise the franking privilege?

Mr. KASSON. That has never been considered as a franking privilege; it is not a franking privilege. The Postmaster-General himself never asked for the repeal of that as a repeal of the franking privilege. Congress put it in the bill, shall I say, not as to this body, but as to some other body, that it was designed as a sort of punishment for the clamor by the press for the repeal of the franking-privilege abuse. Gentlemen know what the fact was as well as I can tell them. It was not asked as a part of the repeal of the franking privilege. It rests upon a different principle entirely. We ought not to charge the same postage for a weekly newspaper deposited in a post-office at the very next door, not going through the mails at all, as is the case with half of the editions that are published in the counties—we ought not to charge them the same postage that is charged for newspapers traveling over great distances and incumbering the mails. They pass in counties and in mails where there is no heavy accumulation; and besides that is the argument that it is in the nature of an irritating tax upon very important means of intelligence within the county. In fact, while the income is trifling, its removal is necessary in order to relieve the country press of a burden which to the metropolitan press is nothing, but which to the local press amounts to a great deal in restricting its circulation.

Mr. FOSTER. And it is not even an equivalent for free city delivery.

Mr. KASSON. As the gentleman suggests, it is not even an equivalent for free city delivery. I must not dwell too long upon these points. I call attention to this bill, which, if the House consents to entertain it as a substitute for the bill of the committee, will be open to whatever amendments the House may consider necessary.

Now, I come to the more important topic of the franking privilege itself. I have alluded to its history. I have shown briefly how it has grown, as the nature of all such things is to grow from day to day and year to year, until it is piled mountain-high; and then comes the fact of a revulsion; then comes a cry of the people for its abolition. And that Forty-second Congress which has been so much censured by the public for some of its actions has never been censured for this. Now, sir, you of the Forty-third Congress are asked to undo the one special reform act of the Forty-second Congress, and to put yourselves to the act of abolishing the abolition of an admitted abuse.

Gentlemen say now, as they said before, "There is no saving to the Government in this; it does not diminish the cost at all of carrying the mails." And it was stated here in my neighborhood yesterday that the prices had even increased in the letting of the contracts this year. Now, a word upon those points. On the 10th of April, 1872, a bill was introduced from this Post-Office Committee to abolish the franking privilege. I will ask the Clerk to read two or three extracts from what was then said.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill was read. It provides in its first section that all laws and parts of laws giving the right to any officer or Department of the Government, or other person, to either send or receive through the United States mails, free of charge, any letter, document, or other mailable matter, are hereby repealed. The second section provides that this act shall take effect on and after the 1st day of July, 1873.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, this bill is similar to the bill that passed this House two years ago. Since then there has been no change in the public sentiment in regard to the abolition of the franking privilege. The same reasons that existed then and called for its abolition exist now. * * * *

Applications have been made, and I believe are now before Congress, asking for an additional increase from 50 to 100 per cent. for carrying the mails, and the argument urged on some of the routes is that there are so many public documents loading down the mails that they cannot carry them at present rates. One railroad president remarked that they did not get as much for carrying the United States mail as they did for carrying coal, for the reason the mails were so loaded down with free matter, public documents, &c. * * * *

In reference to the objection "that nothing would be saved aside from getting the mails carried at a less price," I would state that when this matter was before the House two years ago I ascertained from the postmaster of this city that during three weeks, ten days of which Congress was not in session, there had been an average of over four tons per day of free matter sent out from the city post-office, the postage upon which, if paid, would amount to about $2,000 per day. * *

In regard to the abuse of the privilege, it increases rather than diminishes. When in the dead-letter office a few weeks ago, I saw a bag of law books which was held for postage; it was one of five bags, sent several hundred miles through the mails under the frank of an ex-member of Congress; four bags had gone through, and this bag having broken open, and these law-books discovered in it, was sent to the dead-letter office. And again, it was not long since several bags of large books from a publisher in New York City were detected, directed for one of the great cities of the West, franked by an ex-member of Congress. These are among the few that are stopped while being transported through the mails; but many go unknown, and reach their destination in safety.

Mr. KASSON. I want the House to understand that every argument we listened to yesterday was an argument in this House when the question of repeal was up. By referring to that debate members will see that it was argued that the abolition of the franking privilege would not diminish the cost of carrying the mails; that there would be no saving to the Post-Office Department; that the pretense that there was to be any economy in consequence of it was all humbug. These arguments were repeated yesterday. I looked in the RECORD this morning to find the figures given by the gentlemen who spoke yesterday; but, both of them having reserved their speeches for revision, I am unable to refer to their figures. I remember, however, the purport of those figures, and I wish to state to the House that it is within my knowledge, as a positive fact, that this carrying of enormous amounts of franked matter has seriously affected the cost of carrying the mails. When I was connected with the Post-Office Department I know a claim of many thousand dollars came to us from the overland mail-route for extra compensation in consequence of our taking mail matter from another route and putting it upon that. I have been myself in coaches crossing the country westward which were loaded down with these vast mails, so that passengers were to a large extent excluded. I know that on many of those western routes branching off from the Union Pacific Railroad it has been found almost impossible, except in small detachments, to carry the large amount of franked matter which that country will be entitled to if the franking privilege be restored.

And, sir, the bids now in the Post-Office Department for contracts for carrying the mails for four years in that very western country, including Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, and the Pacific States, are made upon the basis of no free matter passing through the mails, and consequently with no expectation of these tons of mail-sacks of public documents. If we restore the franking privilege, what shall we see next year? Claim after claim from those western contractors for additional expense incurred in consequence of your changing the law and compelling them to carry the contents of whole warehouses across their routes to scatter them through the country.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the bids for carrying the mails are not usually for carrying all the mails for the next four years, and whether this free matter is in any respect excepted?

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman has stated precisely what the law was and is. Nevertheless, that did not prevent contractors from coming before the Department and Congress, claiming that this great Government could not afford to do an injustice, claiming that equity demanded an allowance of compensation for service that was not in point of fact contemplated by them when the contract was made. Consequently the suggestion of the gentleman from Kansas amounts simply to this: that we may impose extraordinary labors not foreseen when the contract was made, and yet, with the power of the Government on our side, shall say, "We will not give you a cent of compensation, because we have your bond;" and the Government, after adding tons of public matter not contemplated in the contract, will, like Shylock, demand the pound of flesh, and the blood along with it.

Mr. CLYMER. My friend from Iowa says that if the franking privilege should be revived, as proposed by the committee, there would be claims for extra compensation. I ask him, if his system were inaugurated, whether like claims would not be made?

Mr. PACKARD. Or, in other words, how much less will they be with the gentleman's twenty-five cent stamps?

Mr. KASSON. I hear those questions coming in all round. I knew when I got to this point it would develop a great earnestness to find out all the details. I am happy to say, in all respects the bill I suggested would be an advantage. The first thing is, you have got more money in your Treasury to meet those claims with if they come. The other point is, that if you do not send them as gratuities, as a special favor to the people who do not ask for them, you will not find any demand at all for many of them, and only the real popular demand for any of them.

I know quite well, Mr. Speaker, we have paid for this Government printing between two and three million dollars largely in consequence of the existence of the franking privilege. You propose now not merely to carry this mass of matter through the mails, but you propose to put all the machinery of the Government Printing Office at work, with all its incidental costs, whether the people want it or not. The substitute bill will give you a test whether the people want it or not. If they want it, the small sum required in my substitute will show by its payment on the part of the people that they do want the documents, and which of the public documents they most value.

Now one word as to the fact alluded to yesterday by the gentleman on my right. It was alleged as a fact there was an increase actually of the contract prices in the bids put in this spring. Fortunately when I went to my room, after the close of the debate, and took up the New York Tribune to read the news from Washington—for I get it there sooner than I do here, and sometimes get it there even before it transpires, so far as my own committee is concerned, [laughter]—when I took up the New York Tribune, I found these facts stated bearing upon this very point, and which facts were obtained unquestionably from the Post-Office Department. I ask the Clerk to read the portion I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

The awards made to-day for the ensuing four years' postal service in the Pacific States and Territories were generally at rates very greatly reduced from the present cost of the same service. For instance, the mail service on the route from Kelton, Utah, to the Dalles, Oregon, which has for the past four years cost $224,000 per annum, was to-day let for $67,900 per annum; and the route from Prescott, Arizona, to San Bernardino, California, was let for $23,800 per year, which is now under contract at $48,000 per annum. The route from Corinne, Utah, to Helena, Montana, was let at $15,000—a saving of two-thirds.

In these and similar cases there are a number of other low bids, indicating that very material reductions will be effected, even if the lowest bidders forfeit their deposits and fail to perform the service. Certified checks, amounting to about $1,500,000, are on deposit with the Postmaster-General as security for the good faith of the various bidders, and will be retained by him until the new service goes into operation.

Mr. KASSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, this will do to show that on these very routes where your franked mail was formerly the most onerous burden, now that you have abolished the franking privilege, the prices for carrying the mails have come down one-half to two-thirds, as the case may be.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KASSON. I will in a moment; but let me finish what I have to say on the point first.

Prices have come down that much on those great routes. In addition to the information derived from that paper, I went into the Post-Office Department this morning, and saw the head of the Contract Office. I do not like to state anything in the nature of facts or reports which does not come in writing; but there was no time to get it in writing, and any gentleman can verify it for himself if he chooses to do so. The chief of the Contract Office told me he believed the contract price over the western district, west of the Mississippi River and north of the Ohio, and embracing Kentucky and Tennessee, but not including the State of Ohio—in that vast postal district he has information sufficient to indicate that there will be a reduction of perhaps 50 per cent. on the former contract prices; and that it would be safe for him to say there would be a reduction of at least 30 per cent. on the former contract prices. Yet gentlemen, in the face of these facts, come in here with a proposition to restore that old congressional perquisite; and say there is no evidence, so far, that there has been any saving to the Post-Office Department by the abolition of the franking privilege.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Iowa will now allow me to ask him a question. I wish to ask him whether he does not candidly believe one-half of the contracts taken at the low prices he states will be forfeited? Does he believe these contracts will be carried out, when taken, as he has stated, at a price two-thirds less than the former price? Are they not mere straw bids?

Mr. KASSON. I believe they will be carried out in every instance with the law as it now exists, where the law has been complied with. Under the law as it was when I was in the Department it might be otherwise. Now these bidders are compelled to put up a deposit as security for the carrying out of their contract. Under that law, I have no doubt, these contracts will be carried out upon the reduced price I have stated.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does not the gentleman from Iowa know that many of these are straw bids, and when the contractors fail to carry out their contracts, the Postmaster-General will then give them out at whatever price he pleases? And then I want him to answer if he believes this reduction is in consequence of the abolition of the franking privilege? I want his candid answer to both questions.

Mr. KASSON. There were two questions propounded by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE.] The first is as to straw bids. I assure the gentleman again that the old system, which admitted all those straw bids, is now changed and repealed; and the competitors, to show their good faith, put up their deposits. The very extract read a moment ago at the desk shows that one and a half millions of money are now in the hands of the Department as guarantees for the contracts. The other question the gentleman from Wisconsin referred to my candor was whether the reduction was owing to the abolition of the franking privilege. I answer it was in part probably owing to other things. But I answer with equal candor that in part, and largely I believe, it was owing to the abolition of those car-loads of matter which the Department ceased to distribute.

Mr. Speaker, I know from my own recollection of the reports that came to us, that in the western country they used to take these sacks by the dozen, laid them under their coaches when they got into mud-holes, used them to fill up the mud-holes, ran their coaches over them, and left them to be picked up by the Indians or the next emigrant wagon. Reports of this sort of thing came time and again to the Department, and we were asked to correct it. Every man who has traveled in that country knows how these sacks of franked matter were piled up, sometimes by whole coach-loads, where several routes of mail communication were concentrated into a great line to be carried through a sparsely settled country.

In some parts of my country, where the weekly mails are carried on horseback in a sack, with a man or a boy on the top of it, what are you going to do if you load that mail-sack with public documents? The carrier cannot possibly, under that system, carry the mails with the expedition and celerity that the postal system requires?

I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. ARCHER,] who desired a short time ago to address a question to me.

Mr. ARCHER. The gentleman spoke of a million and a half, or something in that neighborhood, being in the post-office vaults to make the bids good. Is that in money or in checks?

Mr. KASSON. It is in certified checks, just such as business men in the community take, with the assurance that they will bring in the money.

Mr. ARCHER. Certified by national banks or private banks?

Mr. KASSON. By national banks I suppose in every case. The mode is in accordance with law, whatever it is. I cannot stop to detail that. We passed a bill very recently to authorize the Postmaster-General to transfer their deposits to the Treasury.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KASSON. Certainly; I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HEREFORD. After the abolition of the franking privilege by the Forty-second Congress, did not that same Congress make a larger appropriation for the mail service than had ever been made in the history of the Government?

Mr. KASSON. And for the very good reason, Mr. Speaker, that every year the appropriation increases with the increase of communication.

Mr. HEREFORD. But larger in proportion?

Mr. KASSON. Less in proportion.

Mr. HEREFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. KASSON. Let me give the gentleman official proof. He is entitled to it if his opinion differs from mine. I read from the letter of the Post-Office Department, dated 20th of January last—a Senate document. The Senate sought information on this very point, and it appears that the estimate to which he refers was an increase of 4.07, say 5, per cent. on the previous year. The average increase for the few previous years before the abolition of the franking privilege was about 11 per cent., and I believe upwards. I cannot put my eye on the exact figures, but I know that the annual increase was about 11 per cent.

Now, the actual increase this time, notwithstanding the fact to which the gentleman alludes, was reduced to less than 5 per cent. In other words the amount asked for was $19,270,000; and at the usual rate of increase, which was over 11 per cent., it would have been $20,388,000, a difference of $1,118,000, since the repeal of the franking privilege, upon the estimates of the Department. And this, notwithstanding that at the same time you provided for an increase of compensation to railroads, so that the estimates of the Postmaster-General had to be higher in consequence of the law which you passed enlarging the pay of postal service and the railroads of the country. That, I think, will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. The Postmaster-General in his report for this year shows that the ordinary revenues of the Department for the year ending June 30, 1873, were $22,996,000 and the expenditures $29,000,000. For the year 1872 the revenues were $21,915,000 and expenditures $26,658,000. Now, he estimates that for the next fiscal year the revenues will amount to $29,293,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury, page 8 of his report, estimates the deficiency required by the Post-Office Department as $6,811,000, in the last report, which is higher than it ever was before. I wish the gentleman to explain how that is.

Mr. HEREFORD. That is my recollection, exactly.

Mr. KASSON. Is the gentleman reading from the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; we gave the Postmaster-General last year for deficiencies a little over $6,200,000. Now, he asks for something over $6,800,000, being between five and six hundred thousand dollars more than was given him last year for deficiencies, while his revenue has gone up from $21,000,000 to $29,000,000. That, however, does not appear in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. KASSON. I do not desire to go into a debate on the financial condition of the Department.

Mr. BECK. No; but I want the facts to appear.

Mr. KASSON. Since the gentleman has named the matter, I will state that the growth of the expenses of the Post-Office Department shows a remarkable condition of increase during the last few years. The gentleman will see all the figures on page 4 of this document. It is in consequence of the enormous increase of the railroad service in this country, the enormous expense of carrying the mail on that service, especially in connection with the postal-car system.

Mr. BECK. Is it not true that the deficiencies of the Post-Office Department are now larger than ever before, while the revenues of the Department are much greater?

Mr. KASSON. That is estimated deficiencies. The average increase of the deficiency is only some hundreds of thousands of dollars; I do not recollect the exact amount. The simple fact is that it arises from the enormous increase of expense in carrying the mails over the railroad system of the country. The Postmaster-General has probably based the estimated deficiencies upon the lettings, which he had the right to suppose would be like those of last year, whereas in point of fact they promise to be reduced.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KASSON. I will, if it relates to the subject under consideration.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. On the first page of the Postmaster-General's report is given estimated revenue from the stamps supplied to the several Departments, $2,250,000. Should not that also be added to the deficiency, as being a direct charge against the Government for that postage?

Mr. KASSON. I answer no. It has always been the desire of the Post-Office Department to put its own actual expenses against the receipts that ought to go into its treasury. When I was there we fought against saddling that Department with the subsidies to your ocean steamships, and finally got that item removed and charged to another account, as being for the general commercial interests of the country. Therefore when other Departments, not the Post-Office Department, choose to use the mails, it is not fair to charge upon the Post-Office Department all the expense of all the business of the country, and in that way create enormous deficiencies. I am not here representing the Post-Office Department. If gentlemen want to go into figures about it, I beg them to refer to the committee whose business it is to know them.

Mr. ELDREDGE. But in making proper estimates, I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that he should require the Post-Office Department to give credit for all that is paid to it in the way of postage from the other Departments.

Mr. KASSON. It is included in the receipts.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Precisely.

Mr. KASSON. And is included in this estimate.

Mr. ELDREDGE. And yet, taking into consideration that fact, and the other fact that the franking privilege has been abolished, you find the deficiencies of the Post-Office Department to be greater than before.

Mr. KASSON. I have already spoken of that, and I am not here to defend the Department's finances.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Where then is the saving to the Government? Tell us, if you can.

Mr. KASSON. The deficiencies would be $2,000,000 greater but for this. I say again I am not here fighting the battles of the Post-Office Department. I have no relations with that Department, any more than any other gentleman on this floor. In regard to details of information, I beg to refer gentlemen to the proper source, which is the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I am attempting to speak alone of the franking privilege.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman says the lettings this year are for less sums than they were four years ago, and that is because the franking privilege has been abolished. Is it not the fact that four years ago the lettings were made upon the condition that the mails should be carried in four-horse coaches, which were obliged to be run at stated times, and to make certain connections? This year the lettings have been upon the basis that it was no matter in what the mails were carried so the connection was made; they could be carried in a two-horse wagon, or a one-horse wagon, or on horseback, or in any other way.

Mr. KASSON. That has been the rule for years. The lettings only require certainty, celerity, and security.

Mr. CLYMER. Did they not require four-horse coaches four years ago?

Mr. KASSON. No, sir; that was abolished when I was in the Department, and has not been required for several years. We refused to do anything more than the law required; that is, to make a contract to carry the mails with certainty, celerity, and security.

Mr. CROSSLAND. Allow me to ask a question in connection with that of my colleague, [Mr. BECK.] He says that the Secretary of the Treasury has made estimates for deficiencies of the Post-Office Department, showing a large increase over deficiencies for last year. The Postmaster-General only asks for a deficiency of $4,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury in making the estimates includes the deficiency for subsidizing steamships, making the estimates $2,000,000 more than is asked by the Postmaster-General. The amount asked for by the Postmaster-General is less than the deficiency of last year by $2,000,000. I stand by what the Postmaster-General has asked, and not by what the Secretary of the Treasury asked. The Postmaster-General has asked for a deficiency of only four millions and a little over, which is a reduction of more than two millions. The Secretary of the Treasury asked for $6,000,000, in order to subsidize the ships. That is how it was.

Mr. KASSON. I am glad that this explanation has been made. As I have said, I have not examined fully this financial question.

Mr. BECK. Some time ago I called my colleague's attention to what the Secretary of the Treasury showed from the estimates of the Postmaster-General; and when the gentleman looks at the Postmaster-General's report he will find that he does ask just what the Secretary of the Treasury says he asks, though he puts it in a separate item; and in the appropriations of last year, which were only $6,300,000, those things were all embraced. Now, those estimates were furnished by the Postmaster-General himself; and notwithstanding the increased income of the Department the $29,000,000 are kept out of the Book of Estimates for the purpose of making it appear that we are spending less than we actually are. I confess I have no faith in the Postmaster-General; and he is the only officer of the Government in whom I have none.

[Some further remarks were made by Mr. BECK and Mr. CROSSLAND, which were lost in the confusion in the Hall.]

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I was, when interrupted, about coming to a very interesting point, but I am afraid I shall have difficulty in bringing the attention of the House again to the subject under consideration.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TYNER obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has expired.

Several MEMBERS. Let the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] go on.

Mr. TYNER. I shall object to an extension of the time of the gentleman from Iowa, unless he will occupy the time himself.

Mr. STORM. I ask that the gentleman be allowed fifteen minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] is entitled to the floor, and he must suggest what arrangement he proposes.

Mr. TYNER. I was about to say that I had no objection to the extension of the time of the gentleman from Iowa for, say, ten minutes, if he will occupy the time himself and not yield to interruptions. If he cannot occupy the floor and hold it, then I shall object to his proceeding at all. I wish it also to be understood that whatever time the gentleman from Iowa may occupy shall not come out of my hour.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter of course.

Mr. KASSON. I only wish to say that I always like to yield rather than seem to be guilty of discourtesy; but if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] desires that there should be no interruption, of course I will accept the floor on that condition.

Mr. ELDREDGE, I hope there will be no objection to the gentleman from Iowa proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, without wishing to exaggerate in one way or to diminish in the other, I have explained the apparent influence of the repeal of the franking privilege upon the expense of the contract service. I have also spoken of the fact that its incumbrance of the mails interferes largely with the ordinary and proper transaction of postal business. I now wish to call attention to some of the circumstances attending the repeal of this measure.

I have already had read by the Clerk the substance of the bill reported in April, 1872, by Mr. Hill, of New Jersey, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, for the repeal of the franking privilege. That proposition failed. It did not even get enough support to enable the yeas and nays to be taken upon it. That was in April, 1872. On the 8th of June following Mr. Farnsworth, the chairman of the committee, introduced a bill for the repeal of the franking privilege, and asked that the rules be suspended and the bill passed. Recollect, in April they did not get enough to call for the yeas and nays in this House on the bill for the repeal of the franking privilege. On June 8 they got enough to suspend the rules and pass the bill—139 votes for, and 29 votes against it, on this floor. What had happened in the mean time?

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman allow me ask him a question?

Mr. KASSON. I am under condition not to allow myself to be interrupted.

What had happened in the mean time? There had happened an exceedingly numerous convention, supposed to be of respectable representatives of the larger part of the people. It had assembled at Philadelphia. It was called the republican convention. It nominated Grant and Wilson for President and Vice-President, and at that time it adopted a platform of principles. The tenth resolution of that platform, while it may not be valuable reading to my friends on the other side of the House, will, I hope, be regarded as of some significance by my friends on this side who are republicans. That tenth resolution was that "the franking privilege ought to be abolished, and the way prepared for speedy reduction in the rates of postage." That voice came from Philadelphia, a voice that was heeded by people of the same way of thinking politically, who believed it was a proper principle of republican action in administering the Government of the United States.

And, sir, this House responded to that public demand for the repeal of the franking privilege. This House of Congress passed the bill under a suspension of the rules June 8, but a little time after the adoption of that resolution by the convention. It went to the Senate.

Thus far there was good faith in acting in accordance with this demand. The Senate waited until the people had elected that ticket and ratified that platform at the polls. Then the Senate, yielding to the demand alike of the convention and the people, passed the bill—33 to 16. It came back to the House, and on January 27, as quickly as it could be reached, they suspended the rules again and passed the abolition of the franking privilege.

But, as if not contented with that, on March 3, when the Post-Office appropriation bill came back from the Senate, you passed a clause which clinched the nail on the other side, by expressing the determination of that Forty-second Congress at least that this franking privilege ghost should be laid forever.

Now comes a proposition from the same committee which formerly reported—I do not mean personally, but officially the same committee which reported for the repeal—to this Congress to repeal that law. And what are the reasons given for it? I ask the members on this side of the House whether they are going to back down on the very resolution upon which they were elected to this Congress. Gentlemen regard their pledges once given as too sacred to be forfeited. Cannot members of Congress keep their pledges? Are gentlemen, the moment they are elected, going to throw overboard the platform upon which they were floated into office? Sir, if I knew that was a mistake, that it was a bad exercise of our judgment, since I have been elected on that platform to this Congress I will not go back upon my pledge until the people manifest distinctly their will that we should change our action.

But, sir, it is not the only manifestation of the will of the people. Is this people of ours so weak, this constituency which sent us here so fickle, that it does not know what it wants? Do the new members of the House remember what the people have said about this franking privilege? I want to say to the members, like myself, not in the Forty-second Congress, what I was astonished myself to discover, that the voice of the people was heard by thousands of petitions as well as by the platform of the Philadelphia convention. Here in these baskets are some of the expressions of the popular voice on the franking privilege. I just want the House to see a sample of what the people have said to Congress about the franking privilege. [Showing six basketfuls of petitions for its repeal.]

Mr. RUSK rose.

Mr. KASSON. Do not interrupt this interesting manifestation. [Laughter.] This will do to exhibit to the House.

Mr. RUSK. Did not the Postmaster-General get these up at his own expense, or rather at the expense of the Government?

Mr. KASSON. I wish to show to the House what the voice of the people was which came up to the Forty-second Congress and which that Congress obeyed, as well as the platform of the republican convention at Philadelphia. I will answer the gentleman in one minute; I do not yield for interruptions now. What do we see here? Here is one. These citizens denounce the franking privilege as an abuse.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I wish the gentleman to state——

Mr. KASSON. I tell the gentleman that I will answer him in the course of a minute or two, if he will only restrain his voice just now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SCOFIELD.) Gentlemen will please come to order.

Mr. KASSON. These petitions set forth—

That the abuses of the franking privilege, and the frauds incident thereto, have assumed such enormous proportions, that its total abolition has become a necessity.

They then go on to give the reasons on which this statement is based. And these petitions have come to the House to the extent I have intimated.

Mr. ELDREDGE. How much did it cost to bring them here?

A MEMBER. Are they not all printed alike?

Mr. KASSON. I am coming to that, if the gentleman will not be so very impatient. They want to deprive me of the time the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] has given me. Gentlemen say that they are all printed alike, and that the Postmaster-General did this; that it was the Postmaster-General that sent them out. I do not know who sent them out. I have reason to believe——

Mr. NEGLEY. Every one in my district was sent out by the Department.

Mr. KASSON. I decline to be interrupted. I was not speaking of the gentleman's district.

Mr. NEGLEY. When you said you were speaking of the whole country you spoke of my district.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KASSON. I would have finished ere now if gentlemen had not occupied my time with interruptions.

Mr. SENER. Is unanimous consent necessary in order to the gentleman's proceeding?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is not proceeding at all at present. The House will come to order. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. If the gentleman is going to proceed by unanimous consent, before I give consent I wish to be permitted to ask him a question.

Mr. KILLINGER. The gentleman is not speaking by unanimous consent but in the time of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. TYNER.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will come to order. Gentlemen in the aisles in front of the Chair will please resume their seats.

Order having been restored,

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman will allow me a few minutes to finish my remarks.

Mr. TYNER. I have yielded to the gentleman several times, and as he seems unable to have order preserved in the House while he is addressing it, I will now try my hand.

Mr. KASSON. I gave thirty-five minutes of my time yesterday to the gentlemen of the committee.

Mr. TYNER. And the gentleman's time was extended to-day to make that up, and he received ten minutes in addition.

Mr. KASSON. I had only one extension given me of fifteen minutes.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman from Iowa will observe that other gentlemen are objecting to his proceeding.

Mr. SHANKS. I object to his proceeding any further.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] can yield to the gentleman from Iowa if he chooses.

Mr. TYNER. I decline to yield.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope he will yield long enough to allow him to have the documents read which he has brought in here. [Laughter.]

Mr. BIERY. I rise to a point of order. It seems to me that these documents brought in here are the subject of great confusion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] is entitled to the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 494) amendatory of an act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to patents and copyrights; and

A bill (S. No. 493) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Arkansas.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1903) to dredge and protect the navigable channel at the mouth of Buffalo River against the sand-bar formed by the gale of 1863; and

A bill (H. R. No. 429) creating an additional land district in the Territory of New Mexico.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 825) relating to the distribution of public documents, &c.

Mr. TYNER. Mr. Speaker, if an opportunity shall be afforded for separate votes on the two distinct propositions contained in the pending bill, I will support so much of the bill as authorizes the free circulation of weekly newspapers in the county of their publication, and the free exchange between publishers. But I shall oppose that portion of the bill which provides for what is equivalent to the free distribution of public documents. I arrive at a determination to oppose the last-named provision of the bill by a different course of reasoning from that which seems to have influenced other gentlemen who have taken part in this debate.

Before I proceed to examine the features of the bill, I will ask the House to bear with me while I very briefly allude to the agitation, begun in the commencement of the administration of the present Postmaster-General, which finally resulted in the abolition of the franking privilege. That may throw some light on the subject now, and enable us to act more intelligently. The whole subject, sir, is a practical one for the House and this Congress to determine. There is no sentimentalism involved in the settlement of the questions now presented to the House, nor will the display of ill-temper enable us to arrive at a clearer judgment. I propose to treat it, therefore, as a practical subject, while I recall to the recollection of the older members the anxiety of the Postmaster-General heretofore to encourage and influence the action of Congress in excluding unpaid matter from the mails of the United States.

Four years ago, in his first annual report, he called attention to the subject in a paragraph that I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The cost of free matter has been increasing from year to year, until at last it weighs down the Department into continuous insolvency. The additional expense to which it subjects the service is counted by millions, while there is provided to meet it only the standing annual appropriation of $700,000. It was stated ten years ago that the Department actually expended at that time, in the performance of the duties which the franking privilege imposed, little if anything short of $3,000,000. Since that time the expense has largely increased, and I am convinced that it now exceeds the enormous sum of $5,000,000, about one-half of which is paid on fraudulent matter.

Mr. TYNER. Gentlemen will observe that the cost of the franking privilege is here estimated at $5,000,000 per year, one-half of which enormous sum covered the expense of sending fraudulent matter in the mails. It was a startling calculation, and very properly provoked the severest condemnation of the public. The press and the people did not spare Senators and Representatives who thus abused a system designed to afford a ready and cheap communication between them and their legislators, and they cried aloud for the discontinuance of the evil. Only members of Congress disputed the accuracy of the Postmaster-General's figures, and protested against the injustice of holding them responsible for alleged frauds. I had the honor of debating the subject, at the time, in a speech wherein I attempted to demonstrate, and did demonstrate, that the postage value of all the matter sent under the frank of Senators and Representatives could not amount to one-fourth the sum named in the official report referred to. I am sorry, sir, that I have not time to quote some portions of that speech, because they would more clearly present the subject under discussion than anything I can now say.

Immediately after the publication of the report from which I have quoted, the Postmaster-General caused the printing of a large number of blank petitions, praying for the abolition of the franking privilege, which he sent to all, or nearly all, the postmasters in the United States, accompanied by a circular directing them to present said petitions to the patrons of their respective offices for signatures, intending in this way to impress Congress with the consciousness that the people desired that the mails should be closed against everything except paid matter. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has dragged some of these petitions from their musty resting places and presented them by the basketful to the House as an echo of the voice of the people. It would, therefore, be well to suggest that of the sixty or seventy thousand blanks then sent out there were probably returned from twenty to twenty-five thousand, more or less numerously signed. It was the opinion of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, of which I was then a member, and to which all of these petitions sent to the House were referred, that they had been signed by a number of persons equal to 5 or 10 per cent. of our voting population. How many names appended to them represented minors, or were fictitious, I do not know, nor can I say that any of them were not genuine. It is exceedingly doubtful whether they were signed by 1 per cent. of the voting population. The Postmaster-General, however, had nothing to do with any of them after they left his Department to be presented to the public for signatures.

I will now send to the Clerk's desk to be read one of these petitions. It was taken at random from one of the baskets in which the whole batch was exhibited to the House by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] Thirty or forty names are appended to it, all written by the same hand, and with the same ink.

The Clerk read the petition, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The petition of the undersigned, citizens of ——, respectfully represents: that the abuses of the "franking privilege," and frauds incident thereto, have assumed such enormous proportions that its total abolition has become a necessity. It loads the mails with hundreds of tons of matter properly chargeable with postage, greatly increasing their weight and bulk, and cost of transportation; and, in many cases, retarding the transmission and delivery of legitimate correspondence. It is a special privilege, the benefits of which accrue to the favored few at the expense of the many. It has been the fruitful cause of the large deficiencies charged upon the national Treasury for the support of the Post-Office Department, amounting to millions of dollars annually. It has seriously impaired the usefulness and efficiency of the postal service in meeting the just expectations and increasing wants of the people, in respect to reduced postage charges and enlarged mail accommodations. For these and other reasons, which might be urged, your petitioners humbly pray that your honorable bodies will pass a law abolishing the franking privilege; and, as in duty bound, they will ever pray, &c.

Mr. TYNER. Under the inspiration of instructions thus communicated, and desirous of cutting off an annual expense of $5,000,000, imposed by the so-called franking privilege, the House passed a bill abolishing it; but the Senate did not reach a vote on it during that Congress. When the Postmaster-General submitted his next annual report—his report for 1870-'71—he again called attention to the subject in a paragraph that I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

I am thoroughly satisfied that if the franking privilege were repealed and all matter passing through the mails charged with its fair share of postage, the Department would in a short time be self-sustaining. This assertion when made heretofore was warmly denied, and nothing was left but a resort to a demonstration by figures. It has been already stated the deficiency for the last year has been reduced to $2,814,116.98. Correct accounts of the cost of free matter dispatched through the mails were ordered to be kept by the postmasters for the six months beginning the 1st of January and ending the 30th of June last; and the returns which have been received are now being arranged and tabulated for submission to Congress. I regret that owing to numerous inaccurate and incomplete returns, and the failure of many of the postmasters to make any return, it has been impossible, with the limited number of clerks employed in the Department, to present the results in detail with this report. Enough is known, however, to enable those who are most familiar with the work to express the opinion that the aggregate returns will show the aggregate cost of free matter for the year to be fully equal to the above-mentioned deficiencies. The term during which accounts were kept was confined to the first half of the year, when few elections were held and when only a small portion of the public documents are transmitted. Should the amount of franked matter be accurately ascertained during a presidential canvass, and subjected to the postage charged upon other like matter sent by private individuals, I am convinced that the average cost per annum would be greatly enhanced.

Mr. TYNER. Mr. Speaker, having promised to yield at least one-half of my time to other gentlemen, I am admonished that I must not pause to comment on the difference in the figures of the Postmaster-General's first and second reports. The House will remember that, by his first calculations, it required at least $5,000,000 to represent the postage value of franked matter. After a more careful estimate and revision of his calculations, he came down, in one year, over $2,000,000; but nevertheless, in his second report, he expresses the belief that his Department can soon be made self-sustaining if it can be relieved of this great burden of uncompensated service. Now, sir, I want to address myself to that point for a single moment, for the double purpose of testing his faith in his own opinions, and, also, of framing a concise history of the preliminaries to legislation on this subject, and the results that followed.

The law abolishing the franking privilege went into operation on the 1st of July, 1873. No report of the operations of the postal establishment has since been submitted. I regret that we cannot have it now as a guide, and I also regret that we have no other reliable data by which to judge of the effect of the new law. And right here let me say that the absence of such information as an official report only can furnish will constitute one of my reasons for voting against a substantial revival of the law authorizing the free transmission of public documents in the mails. Let us not be so hasty in undoing the legislation of the last Congress that we cannot judge intelligently as to its effect. If there be economy in closing mail-sacks to anything except paid matter, let that be conclusively shown. The first duty of a Representative is to protect the public Treasury from the encroachments of extravagance, and, above all, to not impose unnecessary burdens that may be misunderstood to constitute personal privileges and conveniences. If the alternative is presented of doing himself a positive injustice on the one hand, or a possible wrong to the public on the other, let his judgment be decided by an anxiety to avoid even the appearance of partiality for himself. So reasoning, sir, I urge the propriety of awaiting the next annual report of the Postmaster-General before we shall revive any feature of the franking privilege. It will be time enough to legislate again when we shall have the results of the first year's operations of the postal service under a system of paid postage. Possibly the demonstrations of a single year will not be reliable and satisfactory, and in that event it would be wise to wait still longer. Until our duty can be foreshadowed by practical results we should scrupulously avoid any disturbance of existing law.

But, sir, while we have no official report to indicate the accuracy or incorrectness of the Postmaster-General's calculations, we may yet test his faith in them by his estimates for the coming fiscal year, and by comparing them with previous receipts and expenditures. If he had proposed to rely solely on his own revenues, or mainly to do so, for the means to meet the immense demands on the postal service, that would show that he was positive beyond a doubt that his Department will become self-sustaining at once. To delay a dangerous venture until experience shall demonstrate the probable safety of undertaking it is wise and prudent. There may be the best of reasons, aside from the necessity of being cautious, for not trying to meet unavoidable expenses by estimated receipts alone. Numerous contracts now in existence may have to give way to others not so expensive, or other arrangements looking to decreased expenditures may have to be perfected before it would be wise to rely alone on his own resources. I do not, therefore, criticise his motives or pretend to challenge the correctness of his calculations. All I propose to do is to ascertain whether his estimates for next year look as though he now believes he can get along without help from the general Treasury. Dry as figures are, I will yet ask gentlemen to listen to those I quote from the Postmaster-General's estimates. These estimates were probably made up after the lapse of one full quarter from the date at which the new law took effect; and he therefore had some means of knowing how much his receipts had been swollen by the increased sale of stamps, even though he may not have known that any real reduction of expenditures would follow.

It appears that the expenditures of the Post-Office Department for the last fiscal year were $29,084,945.67; that the receipts during the same period were $22,996,741.57, showing a deficiency of $6,088,204.10. Now if we deduct from that sum the subsidies paid to mail-steamship lines, not properly chargeable to the ordinary expenses of the Department, to wit, the sum of $725,000, we have an actual deficiency of $5,253,204.10.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the Postmaster-General had still been impressed with the belief that, by reason of the discontinuance of free matter in the mails, his Department would promptly become self-sustaining, is it not probable he would have presented us such estimates for the next fiscal year as anticipated at least a great falling off in deficiencies?

He estimates his expenditures at $33,929,912, and his receipts at $29,293,549; his deficiency, therefore, at $4,636,363. But in his estimated receipts he includes the sum of $2,250,000, to be derived from the sale of official stamps to his and the other Executive Departments. These are to be paid for out of the general Treasury; and while they swell his receipts, and consequently reduce his deficiency, they do not thereby remove him any farther from the slough of actual insolvency. The people pay for them at last, and they only figure to make his balances look better. Deduct, then, these estimated receipts to be derived from the sale of official stamps, and we have as the result a deficiency of $6,836,363, or $1,623,159.90 more than the year before. I do not mean to intimate that the increase will be so great, or that there will be any increase at all. My meaning is that the Postmaster-General's figures produce this result, without distorting them at all.

Now, sir, we may, without injustice, regard these figures as an index to the more matured opinions of this officer on the subject we are considering. Viewing them in that light, I agree with him precisely. Five years of service as an officer of the Department, and such experience as ordinary observation and close application to business for that period would furnish, enable me to predict with some degree of confidence that the next report of the Postmaster-General, and all others that follow it, will show continued deficiencies unless they can be removed by some other expedient than the abolition of the franking privilege. I know, sir, that I address unwilling ears and unbelieving minds, if I now address the public outside of this Hall; but still an honest belief, which I have the right to express even in the face of public opinion, requires me to say that I do not think the abolition of the franking privilege will reduce the expenditures of the Post-Office Department a single dollar. Its receipts will be increased, partly by the amount of postage paid by Senators and Representatives out of their private purses, but far more by the larger sums that will be transferred from the general Treasury to cover the cost of the correspondence of the several Executive Departments. So much as comes out of the pockets of those who have heretofore employed the frank will reduce expenditures, and, consequently, chronic deficiencies that much; but that which is paid by the General Government can hardly be tortured into a corresponding reduction of deficiencies, or a real increase of receipts.

Let me turn now to a suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] He referred to the fact that the late proposals for carrying the mails in the West and Northwest are at largely reduced rates from those at former lettings—probably 30 to 40 per cent. below the last contract prices. He refers to this as one of the first fruits of getting rid of free matter. He will know I am not discourteous in saying that I do not believe this had anything to do with it. I will venture the opinion that no bidder can be found who took this into consideration. But, sir, these favorable bids may be traced to other and entirely different causes. The Forty-second Congress revised the postal laws. The committees of the two Houses having the bill in charge saw the necessity of protecting the Government against the perpetration of frauds, known as "straw bidding," whereby low bidders, who never expected to comply with their proposals, could blackmail higher bidders in consideration of their withdrawing from the competition, leaving the national Treasury to make good the difference between the bids of these two classes of swindlers. The Postmaster-General urged the necessity of a remedy, and one was afforded him in the law from which I quote a section:

SEC. 250. That no contract for carrying the mail shall be made with any person who has entered, or proposed to enter, into any combination to prevent the making of any bid for carrying the mail, or who has made any agreement, or given or performed, or promised to give or perform, any consideration whatever to induce any other person not to bid for any such contract; and if any person so offending is a contractor for carrying the mail his contract may be annulled; and for the first offense the person so offending shall be disqualified to contract for carrying the mail for five years, and for the second offense shall be forever disqualified.

That any person or persons bidding for the transportation of the mails upon any route which may be advertised to be let, and receiving an award of the contract for such service, who shall wrongfully refuse or fail to enter into a contract with the Postmaster-General in due form, and perform the service described in his or their bid or proposal, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, and by imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us apply this provision of the law to offers for carrying the mails over the route referred to by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON]—the route terminating at the Dalles, in the State of Oregon. It is about to be let, he says, at from sixty to seventy thousand dollars per annum. It is now supplied at a cost of something over $220,000. Under the present law, a bid as large in amount as the present contract price would have to be accompanied by a draft for at least $11,000, forfeitable to the United States on the failure of the bidder to execute his contract. This would very naturally make bidders cautious. And besides the section quoted, there is another, imposing punishment by fine and imprisonment on postmasters or other officers who falsely certify to the sufficiency of the guarantors or sureties on the bidders' bonds; and still another, disqualifying any person, under certain circumstances, from ever receiving a contract for carrying the mails.

In a word, Mr. Speaker, we have, for the first time in the history of the Post-Office Department, required men to make honest bids for performing mail service of this kind, and the first results are large reductions in the cost of transportation. To trace these reductions to the abolition of the franking privilege will be found by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to be a tiresome chase. He would doubtless be weary even before he could find a single bidder who gave the subject one earnest thought.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am compelled to hurry through with my remarks, or else disappoint gentlemen who have been promised a part of my time. I will therefore refer to another reason that will influence me to vote against so much of the bill under consideration as provides for sending documents in the mails without cost to members. I refer now to the cost of printing these documents. The aggregate expense of printing and binding documents ordered by law last year, as shown by the Congressional Printer's report, ran up to $674,684.25. This is exclusive of the cost of the printing done on the separate order of the Houses, and is therefore as near an approximation to the cost of printing such documents as are prepared for general distribution as I can make without devoting considerable examination into figures. It is accurate enough to show that at least $500,000 per year can be saved by not printing public documents for distribution among the masses. So long as the expense of conveying such documents in the mails must be borne by members from their own purses, amounting to about one-fourth of their compensation per year, I am quite certain the orders for printing will be few and limited. I therefore go for saving the half million to the Treasury for at least one year, during which time we can make up an intelligent judgment on this whole subject; and if then it shall appear that the exclusion of free matter from the mails does diminish the expense of carrying them, and if the people shall miss these contributions to their literature enough to indicate their anxiety for their continuance, I will, if I should be here, join in an effort to revive the whole or a part of the old law. At present, however, I cannot do so.

There is a better solution of the insolvency of the Post-Office Department than that afforded by the theory that the franking privilege causes it. I have taken the trouble, since I began to think of this subject, to make up a statement of the cost of some of the expensive routes in Texas, Nebraska, and some of the Territories. I find that the cost of sending the mails over one route in Nebraska, five in Texas, and five in the Territories, amounts, under the present contract prices, to $681,293 per year, while the salaries of postmasters on the line of these routes, which are the closest data we have to arrive at the amounts of the revenues derived from the mail service thereon, aggregate only $34,009; showing that there has been paid out year after year, in supplying these long routes in the several Territories and in two or three of the States named, the sum of $645,000 over and above the entire receipts of the offices thus supplied. I will further state to the House that the mail service over these routes is in some cases performed seven times a week each way, in others six, and in no case less than twice. Now, sir, these long and expensive mail-routes supply the hardy pioneers who settle our frontiers with the means of communicating with the rest of the world, and assist in carrying to their cabins the evidences of spreading intelligence and civilization in thickly settled communities. They do much to make frontier life endurable; and while I would not cut them off, it might be possible to lessen the service on them, and thus reduce expenses. At any rate they have done more to build up balances against the Treasury than all the matter ever carried under cover of the frank; and yet, sir, I would permanently dispense with the frank sooner than curtail these mail facilities.

I have now done with that branch of the subject, and beg leave to call the attention of the House to only one more. Gentlemen have spoken as though the passage of this bill, providing for the furnishing of stamps to carry public documents free in the mails, would antagonize the position of the Postmaster-General. I do not so understand it. Four years ago, when he first presented this subject to Congress, he only took ground against the transmission of free matter in the mails. He then recommended the plan of providing the several Departments and Senators and Representatives with stamps to cover their official correspondence and the cost of sending official documents. Even in what I have said I did not suppose I was criticising his recommendations. I have only challenged the accuracy of his calculations and predictions. The supporters of the bill need not assault his positions on this subject, for his first suggestions are in the line of their wishes. To make good this statement, I will ask the Clerk to read a brief extract from his first annual report.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is not proposed or desired that Government officials should be personally taxed for the transmission of their public correspondence. It is asked, on the other hand, that every Department, every member of Congress, and every other public officer, shall have a liberal allowance of stamps for postage, subject to a proper accountability, and that the sum necessary therefor shall be appropriated out of the general Treasury.

Mr. TYNER. Now, sir, if the House will bear with me for a moment only, while I present in as concise a form as possible two or three reasons why I support the rest of the bill, I will then yield to one or two other gentlemen. Every gentleman must recognize the fact that there is the greatest injustice and inequality in the rates of postage on newspapers. There is not the same injustice and inequality in the rates of postage on letters. Drop-letters, in towns and cities where the letter-carrier system has not been adopted, are charged postage at the rate of one cent per half ounce; in cities where letter-carriers are employed, two cents; while mail-letters are charged three cents. The distinction is clear and explicit; the additional postage is charged as an equivalent for the cost of conveying the letter in the mails. There is no such distinction in newspaper postage. The subscriber of a weekly pays as much postage on the newspaper he takes from the delivery-window of the post office in the town where it is published, and which has never been in a mail-sack, as though it had been carried from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast. I need only state this fact with which, however, all are familiar, to show the gross injustice of continuing the present law. The country press is generally poor, and unable to bear the heavy and unnecessary burdens. To give them a fair chance with the great metropolitan weeklies, made up as they are of clippings from dailies already in print, and, therefore, inexpensive, we must give them some advantages in the way of cheap postage, or no postage at all. And not only the press, but those who support the press—the subscribers of the country weeklies—demand their free conveyance in the mails. The proposition is, therefore, not to extend favors to publishers alone, but to their patrons. But if gentlemen will not put them on the free list, I at least urge the propriety, as an act of justice and common honesty, that they shall be charged postage at merely nominal rates.

And in behalf of exchanges it is only necessary to say that the continuance of postage on them is the continuance of a tax on the spread of information. This medium of interchanging thought for public use, public improvement, and public welfare, ought not to be obstructed for the single purpose of deriving a paltry sum in the way of postage. Let it go free as raw material out of which improved thoughts and ideas are manufactured, and then require prepayment on all other newspapers except weeklies. If this be done, my observation and experience enable me now to promise more than double the revenue derived from postage on all newspapers under the present loose system of collecting it.

I now yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Believing as I do that the perpetuity of republican institutions depends upon the intelligence and virtue of the people, I am in favor of the largest dissemination of information among the masses. With this sentiment in my mind, I shall vote for the bill that has been reported by the committee, asking, however, when the proper time shall arrive, that some amendments may be made to it in order to remove unjust discriminations in favor of some and against others of the newspapers of the country.

In the third section of the bill the committee has provided, and I think very justly too, that weekly newspapers shall be sent free of postage to individuals residing in the county of publication. This is a privilege that was afforded to them previous to the abolition of the franking privilege; and it is one which I think should be accorded to them in the interest of general education, through the dissemination of knowledge among the people. It also enables them to compete more fully with the newspapers of the great cities, which, with their large capital and greater facilities, crowd hard upon the country papers, and in some districts affect materially their circulation.

But I wish to call the attention of the House to the injustice of restricting this privilege merely to weekly newspapers. There is growing up around us a new kind of daily paper of great value, that may properly be called the people's newspaper. It is the little one-cent newspaper, like the one I hold in my hand, that is published daily in the different towns throughout the country. They are now most unjustly taxed, at a far higher rate, in proportion to their subscription prices, than are the large dailies of the great cities.

This newspaper is one published in my district, and is like three or four others that are published there. It is the only daily paper that reaches the poor man. It goes to the laboring man, the mechanic, the artisan, and affords them all the daily reading of the news that they get. These papers are ably edited; they condense the topics of the day, political and literary, and contain the local news. Their circulation is circumscribed by the bounds of the county where they are published; generally speaking they do not get outside of it. The greater part of their issue is now sent through the mail to the little country villages, and afford the principal daily reading of their inhabitants.

This daily, called the Daily Local News, is furnished to subscribers at the rate of three dollars per year. The postage upon it is $1.20 per year, or 40 per cent. of the subscription price. This other daily printed in my district, the Chester Evening News, is issued at $2.75 per annum. The annual postage upon it is $1.20, or 44 per cent. of the subscription price.

I also have here a copy of the New York Tribune, a daily paper printed in the city of New York, containing a much larger amount of information, and going almost entirely among the wealthier classes of the community. The subscription price is ten dollars per year; yet it pays only $1.20 per annum in the shape of postage, the same as the others, or only 12 per cent. of the subscription price. I say, then, that this is an unjust and odious discrimination against the poor man and in favor of the rich man, taxing the information afforded the former at a much higher rate than that of the latter.

More than that, I may say that these large city dailies pay no postage at all in perhaps nine cases out of ten. They do not circulate largely through the mails. They are carried in large packages by express companies throughout the country; they are distributed by newspaper agents in every large town and at every station along the railroads. By taking large quantities of them the newspaper agents are enabled to get them at a reduction on the yearly rate of subscription, and are generally enabled to sell them to their customers at the regular subscription price without the addition of postage, thus making a still greater difference between the country and metropolitan dailies.

Therefore, when the proper time arrives, if the gentleman who has charge of this bill will allow me—and if not, I hope the opportunity will in another way be afforded—I propose to offer an amendment, to strike out from the third section the word "weekly," and to insert in its place the words "all others" before the word "newspapers;" so that all newspapers printed in any county shall be distributed free of postage through the mails to the subscribers in that county. I feel that this privilege is due to this important class of newspapers.

I wish to make a single further remark with regard to what is considered the public sentiment of the people in relation to the abolition of the franking privilege. You have all seen here the large number of petitions exhibited to-day by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] I do not know that in the whole course of legislation on this floor there has ever been exhibited to the House or to the nation a more purely artificial public sentiment than that which was got up for the abolition of the franking privilege. It was a sentiment inaugurated in the Post-Office Department; it was got up by the Postmaster-General, who, believing, no doubt, it was in the interest of the Government, had circulars printed here and sent out to all the postmasters in the nation, who seemed to consider it their official duty to obtain signatures to those petitions and send them here. In regard to all the petitions that were sent to me, there were but two letters accompanying them, and in neither one of them was any request made to me to support the proposition to abolish the franking privilege. Those petitions came to me without note or comment. The postmasters seemed to think it was incumbent on them to get signatures and forward the petitions. It was in that way that this artificial public sentiment was made manifest. It was not a spontaneous effusion of the people's will. And we, not being aware then, as we are now, how the thing was done, very hastily, and I think, injudiciously, repealed the franking privilege.

In the interest of the people, therefore, who ought to have information disseminated among them as cheaply as possible, who are entitled to know what we do here, I feel that all public documents printed by Congress should have a ready and extensive circulation, for the national benefit in the enlightenment of the public mind far outweighs the comparatively small expense they occasion.

Let then the people have every opportunity to be informed through the medium of congressional publications and cheap newspapers.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TYNER. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] for seven minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have only two or three reflections which I wish to submit to the House. In the first place, I quite agree with what has been said here by one gentleman, that it is not yet time for us to say that we have fairly tried the effect of the repeal of the franking privilege. The repeal took effect only on the 1st day of July last, and we have had less than eight months in which to test its results. If we restore the frank, as proposed in the pending bill, it ought to be because we have already found by experience that it was unwise legislation, or because we have clear and conclusive proof that the people demand its restoration. I have heard no evidence that either of these conditions exists at the present time.

Gentlemen have sneered at the twenty-five thousand petitions that were laid before Congress, because most of them were copies of a blank sent out by the Postmaster-General. It is neither wise nor just to sneer at a petition because the man signing it is not the man who drafted its prayer. I hope gentlemen will not throw contempt upon the people by insinuating that they were made the tools of the Postmaster-General; that they were duped into signing petitions which they knew and cared nothing about. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, there was a general demand for the repeal of the franking privilege, and a very general conviction that it had grown to be an abuse. The impression had become general, though erroneous, that the frank was a sort of corrupt perquisite which Congressmen enjoyed, and which ought to be taken away from them. In so far as that was the feeling I did not sympathize with it at all. It was not on any such ground that I voted for the repeal. True, there were abuses growing out of the frank. Who can deny that the abuse was great when we saw two political armies quartered in the two wings of this Capitol during the last presidential campaign, one of them sending out their franked documents by the million from one end of the Capitol, and the other sending them out by the million from the other, with an army of clerks at work and the mails loaded with tons of weight which bore no share of the burden of supporting the postal service? I believe that was an abuse, and an abuse that good men everywhere wanted to see abolished. The franking privilege having been abolished, let us stand by the present system, and fairly test its results. If we find that any marked injustice has been wrought by the law, let us amend it. But in my judgment it would be unseemly trifling for us to restore the frank as proposed in this bill. We have seen the dozen basketfuls of petitions sent in at the last session, asking for the repeal, but we have not seen a single petition asking for the restoration of the frank.

Gentlemen say that the restoration is to be made in the interest of the people. Let us at least wait till they ask for it.

I admit that to abolish the frank for the Executive Departments and to issue official postage-stamps is in itself no saving of money. This has apparently swelled our appropriations for the current year by almost $2,000,000; and yet the $2,000,000 worth of stamps authorized to be used actually cost the Government less than $8,000. So that an actual expenditure of $8,000 in money appears on the books of the Treasury as an expenditure of $2,000,000. That is one of the items which made the appropriations of the last Congress appear larger than they really were.

But there is another phase of the case that has seemed to me a much greater abuse than the frank itself. I refer to the extraordinary amount of public printing. Aside from the Congressional Globe, which cost us about $350,000 a year, we have been paying nearly $2,000,000 a year, for several years, for public printing. The Executive Departments and Congress have been printing, binding, and issuing books and documents by the million of copies. We have been sending them out without any special knowledge of what the demand of the country was for such documents. To accomplish this we have built and maintained the largest printing house on the globe. I believed this excessive amount of printing was an abuse, and an abuse that nothing but the repeal of the frank would correct. If this bill should pass, all that evil will be brought back upon us. The whole business of printing to the amount of $2,000,000 a year, for the purpose of sending out documents which we certainly do not know whether the people want or not, will be continued. We shall continue to tax the many to print documents for the few; and that, too, not on their demand, but of our own motion. The abuses of the frank and of the extravagant printing heretofore done ought not to be revived.

But in repealing the franking privilege I think we did injustice to one class of our citizens, an injustice which, in my judgment, we ought to rectify. For this reason I am in favor of passing one section, and only one section, of the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PACKER.] I refer to the third section, which makes newspaper exchanges free and allows papers to circulate free within the counties where they are published. I will vote for that section as a matter of justice and of public policy. As the case now stands, the repeal of the frank has seriously crippled the country newspaper press. The five thousand weekly newspapers of the United States are, in my judgment, our most authentic exponents of public opinion. Compare, for example, the metropolitan journal with the country paper, in their relation to the public mind. In one case the editor is the head of a great business establishment, which he manages in the interest of its owners. The telegraph brings him in communication with central points of a vast area of country; but those points are mainly cities and villages. His staff all are brilliant thinkers and accomplished writers, but they have little contact with the people themselves. By midnight the metropolitan journalist has received at his office the brief report of the most striking events of the day from other cities and centers, and he dashes off a brilliant editorial which he sends out a thousand miles in all directions, and this is called the sentiment of the American people. Compare this with the less brilliant work of the country newspaper editor. In the course of the week he sees and converses with men from every township of his county, and his mind thus becomes filled with the prevailing thoughts and sentiments around him. If he be a sensible and observing man, the week's intercourse with his fellow-citizens will make his paper a better exponent of the sentiment of his county than all the distant metropolitan journals of the United States put together. I do not say this to disparage these journals. They have a value peculiarly their own. But the five thousand weekly newspapers of the country are far more truly the photographs of the public mind than the great daily journals are.

If I am correct in these views, it would be a public calamity if the country press should be destroyed or seriously crippled.

Now the repeal of the frank has clearly had this tendency. It threatens to break down a large number of the small country newspapers that could only compete with the metropolitan press by the aid of their free circulation within their counties. But aside from these considerations of public policy, it is a positive injustice to charge the same rate of postage for both these classes of papers. The weekly New York paper coming a thousand miles or more, and weighing three times as much as the small country newspaper, can now be delivered at the same rate of postage as one of those country newspapers which is carried to a post-office but five miles from the place of publication. This is an injustice which ought to be remedied. It ought to be remedied in the name of public education; and the metropolitan press ought to consent to it for their own good, to enable them to know more accurately and fully what are the tides and currents of public opinion.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether all those country newspapers did not ask that we should abolish the franking privilege.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not know whether they did or not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I know they did; and I thought at the time they would get sick of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, recognizing the full force of that German proverb that "speech is silver, but silence is gold," if it had not been for some of the extraordinary positions of my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] on this question, I would not have said a word upon it. But I want to say in the beginning of the brief remarks I wish to make on this question I am wholly in favor of the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PACKER,] chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I was in favor of that bill when first introduced.

I confess the beauty and eloquence and pathos with which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] alluded to the condition of the little boy and that poor, broken-down old mare which carried the mail through his district so worked on my sympathetic nature that for a moment I was swayed from the support of this bill. [Laughter.] I wish to make a statement in connection with that fact. In 1869 and 1870 I went into the gentleman's district in Iowa, and I did not find a horse or a mare in that district able to stand. The people told me there they had all been broken down packing over the county these public documents. [Laughter.] It will be remembered by the House that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] was in Congress at that time, and if there was any abuse of this privilege at that period it must have been done by him.

Let us look a moment at this magnificent plan the gentleman proposes to this House and which he asks it to adopt. By way of prelude I will remark right here that there is one disease afflicting the body-politic of this country, and it is this: that every time a public man, every time a legislator, every time a lawgiver in the land crosses the briny deep he is not satisfied unless he can come back here and graft upon this republican tree of ours some scion of monarchy and aristocracy. This bill of the gentleman from Iowa is one of those obnoxious shoots from the royal stem of old England brought over here by the gentleman from Iowa. [Laughter.] This does very well in a country where the ruling class is interested in keeping the honest masses of the country in absolute ignorance, but it will not do in this broad land of light and liberty, where intelligence is the sheet-anchor of the people's hopes and the people's liberties. It will not do in republican America.

Now, how is it in England? All over the British Isles you will find establishments organized and presided over by persons called "the Queen's booksellers"—persons who have the privilege of selling public documents, and who are permitted to place over their places of business the Queen's coat of arms. Do you want "the President's booksellers" all over the country? I suppose that will be the next step. That, I presume, will be the next shoot that some man who so much admires the institutions across the water will seek to ingraft upon the republican institutions of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I want none of it. Nor do I wish the rule to prevail which prevailed in Rome when a tyrant made the laws which emanated from his own breast only, and then hung them up so high the people could not read them, in order that he might take advantage of their ignorance and punish them.

You lock up the avenues of intelligence connected with this Government; you break down the barriers against corruption the moment you do it. It is the duty and the right of the people of this country to know what we are doing here, to know what these Departments are doing, to know what is being done by their representatives.

Now I will have to pass on, as my time admonishes me I must be brief on each point.

The gentleman from Iowa made a remark which I am sure he did not intend, and it is this: that if we could look into the hearts of members here we would find it was not for the purpose of disseminating knowledge among the people that they support this bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but because they desire their own advancement. It is not the first time I have heard some would-be leaders of this House impugning the motives of other gentlemen here.

If I were disposed I could say, but I will not, that, when I take up the substitute of the gentleman from Iowa, it was not for the purpose of disseminating information among the people that he desired the newspapers of the county should circulate free, but it was from the fear of what might be said by this palladium of our liberties, the unpurchased and unpurchasable press. [Great laughter.] I could say that, but I will not do it. [Renewed laughter.]

There is another point. He says the republican party adopted a platform at Philadelphia, and he referred to the tenth resolution of that platform, which says the franking privilege ought to be abolished. He then said that the Forty-second Congress came back here from the Philadelphia convention and immediately complied with that resolution by abolishing the franking privilege. While I think they did it at that time, yet, to use a vulgar phrase, they kicked their own action in the face, because at the same session of Congress they provided for allowing forty thousand of the people to exercise this very privilege. That is what that Congress did. Consistency is a jewel, but it ought to be worn by the gentleman as well as by the rest of us.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him why he voted in the last Congress for the repeal of the franking privilege, under Mr. Farnsworth's bill? What new light has he received? If he thought the franking privilege should be done away with then, why does he want it restored now?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. As I have only seven minutes, I cannot go fully into what is suggested by the gentleman from Iowa. In the vote I gave, to which the gentleman refers, I voted with the whole House, and in pursuance of the action of the republican convention held at Philadelphia at that time. But I will say to the gentleman that it was the abuse of the franking privilege which the people objected to, which the Philadelphia republican convention objected to, and which the Forty-second Congress objected to. It was not the exercise of what was really a privilege of the people, such as is sought to be given by this bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but it was the abuse of this privilege that had grown up which was objected to by the country. The personal frank of members had been used without their consent. The frank of the Departments had been used without their consent. And the object and intent of the republican convention, in passing its resolution in reference to the franking privilege, was to destroy that abuse.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TYNER. I yield seven minutes, the balance of my time, to my colleague from Indiana, [Mr. PACKARD.]

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I would like a few minutes longer.

Several MEMBERS. "Go on!" "Go on!"

The SPEAKER. There is a request made that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] may proceed without prejudice to the right of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] to assign the balance of his time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I will say further, that when I gave that vote I knew that it would become necessary to give the Departments this privilege; I knew it would become necessary to give the people this privilege, such a privilege as we seek to give them in this bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PACKER.] I knew that it would become absolutely necessary; and upon no other principle can the action of that Congress be explained. Upon that principle, and that alone, can it be consistently and justly and honestly explained.

Now, it is not sought by this bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to re-establish the abuse at all. Nobody asks by this bill that this personal privilege belonging to the members of this House and of the Senate shall be restored. What is wanted is simply that the means of disseminating information justly due to the people of this country shall be restored to them.

Mr. KASSON. But the bill expressly provides that this very matter shall be sent under the frank of the members of the two Houses.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. That is merely as a means of authenticating the document that is to be sent. The bill further provides that no document shall be sent that has not been ordered to be published by both this House and the Senate.

Mr. KASSON. The first section provides for a stamp, and then there is also a provision made that the matter shall be sent under a frank.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The name of the member on the back of the book is a certification to the proper officer of the House that the document is one that ought to go. Is it not the name of the member which carries it through the mail?

Mr. KASSON. It is. It cannot go without it.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The name of the member alone does not carry it.

Mr. WILBER. Will not a clerk be able to use the member's frank, as before?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. It will do him no good if he does use it, for no book or document will go through the mails under this bill unless it is stamped by the Clerk of the House or the Secretary of the Senate. It is the stamp which carries it through, and not the name of the member.

If you confine the privilege to the members of Congress, that, I suppose, will deter any other man from the use of it; although perhaps it may be true that there is no law you can pass which some one will not violate.

I desire to make just one other remark in answer to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] His whole argument on this floor was against the restoration of the franking privilege. The tenor of his speech was in that direction. He appeals to the feelings of this House by bringing up here piles of petitions that had been lying away in some underground pigeon-holes for several years. He undertakes, I suppose, to frighten somebody by these postmasters' petitions. But what does the gentleman do himself in that connection? He is willing to restore the privilege of free transmission through the mails to one class of people. He is willing that a man who publishes a newspaper for a business, and for profit, shall have it. But he is not willing that the people should come to the fountain-head and get their knowledge here in the shape of these authentic documents published by authority of Congress and distributed to the people for their information.

I do not know, sir, how it is in the gentleman's district. But I wish to say in reference to my own people that there is not a single document published here that is not sought after and read and studied by the people of my district. Unfortunately for me and for the people of my district we do not get enough of them. We do not get as many as we ought to have. Gentlemen parade here the cost of the publication of these documents. I say, sir, that one of the duties of this Government is to disseminate intelligence, and I do not care what the cost may be. When we talk of the cost of supporting our Army and our Navy I will have something to say in objection to it. But when we come to the post-office system or any system which disseminates knowledge and information among the people, let it cost what it may, I am in favor of it.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 438) to withhold from sale the site of the old light-station at Nyatt Point; and

An act (H. R. No. 1906) to dredge and protect the navigable channel at the mouth of Buffalo River against the sand-bar formed by the gale of December, 1873.

TRANSMISSION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to the transmission of public documents, &c.

Mr. PACKARD. On the 15th of December last I had the honor to introduce into this House a bill, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read as a portion of my remarks, and which, if I have the opportunity, I shall offer as a substitute for the bill now under consideration.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill to provide for the free transmission by mail of certain mail matter.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following mail matter shall be allowed to pass free in the mail: first, official matter, written or printed, sent by or addressed to chiefs, heads of Bureaus, chief clerks, or other officer of either of the Executive Departments, including all such blanks as are required by the business of the several Departments; secondly, copyright matter to the Librarian of Congress, if marked on the package "Copyright matter;" thirdly, petitions to Congress, if properly marked and designated; fourthly, notices to publishers of the refusal or neglect of subscribers to take newspapers, magazines, or other periodicals from the post-office, to be sent under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe; fifthly, dead letters returned to the writers thereof; sixthly, not more than ten copies of each of the public documents published by order of Congress to each of the several congressional districts and Territories of the United States, to be placed in such public school or college libraries as Representatives and Delegates may designate, the same to be sent under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, properly stamped and marked; seventhly, weekly newspapers, one copy to each actual subscriber within the county where the same is published and in the counties immediately adjoining.

SEC. 2. That all mail matter not hereinbefore specially made free must be prepaid by postage-stamps.

Mr. PACKARD. In the introduction of the bill which has just been read I had in view certain objects, one of which was the transmission of certain kinds of mail matter, and especially official matter sent out from the Departments. My design was to obviate any necessity on the part of the Government to print stamps to be placed upon the communications, documents, and blank forms by which the Departments of the Government transact their own official business. That was one of the objects of my bill.

Another object was to provide for the transmission free through the mails of newspapers in the counties where published. And, as will be seen by reference to the bill which has just been read, it would extend that privilege to the counties immediately adjoining. It seemed to me that that was proper, for this reason: As a matter of fact, country newspapers do not circulate much outside of the county where they are published. But there is occasionally a newspaper published on the edge of a county, almost on the county line, outside of the county seat. The circulation of such newspapers is very frequently greater in the adjoining county than in the county where it is actually published. My design was to provide for cases of that sort. I believe it is just and right that those cases should be provided for. And I believe that it is just and right that country newspapers should have this free circulation in the counties where published and in the adjoining counties. The difference in postage receipts would be unappreciable, for the reason that the circulation of the country newspapers is, except in rare instances, almost wholly in the counties where published.

Another object I had in view was to provide for the dissemination of information among the people. I hope that in any opposition which I may manifest toward the bill of the committee no member of this House, and no person who may hear or read what I say to-day, will suppose for one moment that I am opposed to the dissemination of information among the people. I believe that the bill which I have presented will furnish that information to the people more effectually and better than the bill which has been reported by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

And how and why? The documents which we send out from Congress as its publications are books of reference only. Very few of them are read through from beginning to end; that is not their purpose. They are books of reference. Sometimes I may want to consult a page of one of those books. At another time my neighbor may want to consult another page. Now put them where the people can reach them, and a lawyer who may want to look into one of them would have the opportunity to do so. But perhaps in my distribution of those documents under the old franking system I have failed to send the lawyer the document he desires to consult, but have sent it to his neighbor, a merchant, who has no use for that particular book.

Suppose we place these books in the libraries of the country, one or two in each county, in the library at the county seat or in the school libraries; I would not be particular as to the number. But if we put them into the libraries, then the newspapers and other vehicles of information will inform the people that those books are there. And when any question arises that a lawyer, merchant, farmer, or a man pursuing any trade or profession in life, desires to examine, he will know where to go for the information. We can put these books into the libraries of the country at a mere fraction of the expense that would be incurred by sending them out in the miscellaneous way in which they have heretofore been sent.

It has been suggested that there would be little or no increase of expense by sending documents through the mails. When I first came to a preceding Congress and was about to vote upon the franking privilege, I thought then, and I still think, that the transmission of documents did not add to the expense of carrying the mails. But it will add to it now, for the reason that weight has become an element in contracts with railroad companies for carrying the mail. We have heard it stated here to-day that bidders for contracts have put their bids lower than before. I do not know whether that was on account of the repeal of the franking privilege, but it seems to me it is reasonable to conclude that was held in view by them in making their bids. Certainly if I was going to make a bid or a contract for carrying the mails over any given route, and I knew that one hundred thousand pounds per week were to be carried; or, on the other hand, that not more than one thousand pounds were to go, I certainly should make a difference in the bid.

Another element of expense we have right here in the Capitol. The Doorkeeper of the House a few days ago was directed to reduce his force by one-third, because of the abolition of the franking privilege. If we resume the right to send public documents through the mails free of postage that force must be brought back here. My colleague who has spoken on this bill to-day [Mr. TYNER] has stated, and it is a moderate estimate, that it will certainly increase the expense of the Public Printing Office at least $500,000 per annum. Now, under the substitute which I propose the people of the country will be furnished with documents in a more satisfactory manner than they can possibly be under the system of transmission of documents proposed in the bill of the committee. Take the agricultural report. Of that document each member receives about six hundred copies. I have in my district thirty thousand voters. Only one out of every fifty of those men can get an agricultural report. Can any man tell me a good reason why forty-nine men should help to pay for the agricultural report which one man receives? Why should A help to pay for the book that B gets?

In sending out these documents to one in every fifty, they are sent generally to personal and political friends. Why should the democrats in my district help my republican friends to pay for their documents; and why should the republicans in the district of my colleague [Mr. NIBLACK] help to pay for the documents which he sends to his democratic friends? Under my substitute the people will get this information, and everybody will be placed on an absolute equality.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman has said he sends documents to his political or personal friends only; does he not send them to every man who asks for them?

Mr. PACKARD. Certainly; but, as a rule, I send them to my personal friends; there are some democrats who are my personal friends and to whom I am glad to send documents; and I suppose other gentlemen do the same.

In the few seconds that are left to me I want to add that I have regretted to see here to-day a disposition to ridicule the petitions that have been sent here by the people on the subject of the repeal of the franking privilege. My impression is that the people who sent those petitions here knew what they were about. Certainly the delegates who composed the Philadelphia republican convention, and who were from and of the people, could not have misunderstood public sentiment. They did not; and they only echoed the popular feeling when they said, "The franking privilege ought to be abolished." It is not wrong for Representatives here to listen to that voice. It was in obedience to it that the Forty-second Congress repealed the franking law. And now, I ask, has there been any demand for its restoration? None whatever. The people do not ask it. They do not expect or desire it. We may well and safely delay its restoration, at least until we have some assurance that the country desires it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STOWELL obtained the floor.

Mr. NIBLACK. Before this debate proceeds further I would like to submit a proposition to the gentleman having charge of the bill, [Mr. PACKER,] that after to-day the debate shall be confined to ten-minute speeches. I think that in this way gentlemen who desire to be heard would be better accommodated, better than under the present arrangement, by which any gentleman obtaining the floor holds it for an hour.

Mr. PACKER. The committee have no desire at all to shut off debate on the bill. Whenever the House desires to close the debate we are willing to ask for the previous question. On the other hand, so long as the House desires the debate to continue we have no wish to stop it.

The SPEAKER. The arrangement suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] cannot be made except by unanimous consent, or by a suspension of the rules on Monday.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object.

Mr. POTTER. I wish to say to the gentleman in charge of this bill, that thus far no gentleman on this side of the House has been allowed to speak at all, either for or against the bill. Some of us would like to occupy at least ten minutes.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Let me remind the gentleman that this side of the House will be held responsible for the action on this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is this to be a close corporation, and are gentlemen on the other side to take the responsibility together with all the perquisites of the concern? [Laughter.]

Mr. PACKER. Not at all. We are very anxious to hear from gentlemen on the other side. There is no effort on the part of the committee to restrict debate in any particular.

Mr. ELDREDGE. My remark was directed to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] not to the gentleman who has charge of the bill. I thought I had a right to go for a Vermonter whenever I had a chance. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. We are ready for you.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will close this question as soon as possible, that we may get to other matters of public business which are of less consequence, perhaps, but which it is necessary to consider.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] always wants debate to close after he has made his speech.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the House would fix a time when the debate shall close—say four weeks from now or three weeks from now, any reasonable time—I think it would be desirable.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. It seems that the older members of this House always have an opportunity to speak when their committees report and when every other committee reports. But inasmuch as about one hundred and seventy of us were not members of any former Congress and may desire to get our views before the country when our committees report, the gentleman from Ohio will pardon us if in this case we desire to keep open the discussion until we can be heard.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, if four weeks be considered too short a time, make it five; but let us fix some time for the closing of the debate.

Mr. STOWELL. I cannot yield any further.

Mr. PACKER. But two members of the committee have yet been heard. The House will remember that the greater portion of the time has been occupied by gentlemen who are not members of the committee. Several other members of the committee desire to speak.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. STOWELL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SENER. I understand my colleague will yield to me to make a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say in regard to the usage, for there is no rule on the subject, where a committee reports a measure, members for or against are recognized alternately to the extent of the time during which the debate is allowed. When the committee is unanimous, opportunity must be given, of course, to expression of opposition outside of the committee. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has had two hours allotted to its members. The position of the gentleman from Virginia, also a member of the committee, is recognized by his holding the floor. The Chair understands the gentleman from Tennessee, who is a member of the committee, is opposed to the bill, and it will be the duty of the Chair to follow in that way. Members of the committee cannot speak consecutively if the committee is unanimous. If the opposition is in the committee it is to be heard first, and if it is not in the committee, then other members of the House are heard as chance may fall. That is the law which prevails.

Mr. CONGER. My objection is this, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] after he has had his full say on this subject proposes we shall at once close the door to any further debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has not the power to close the door. It would take a majority of the House to do that.

Mr. STOWELL. I will yield to a motion to take a recess.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 269) to change the titles of certain naval officers, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HODGES, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for twenty days.

NATHANIEL KUYKENDALL.

On motion of Mr. HEREFORD, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Nathaniel Kuykendall, in order that they may be presented to the Senate, no adverse report having been made.

FRANK Y. COMMAGERE.

On motion of Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Frank Y. Commagere, no adverse report having been made in the case.

C. M. FRANCE.

On motion of Mr. BROMBERG, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers accompanying a bill (H. R. No. 594) for the relief of C. M. France, of Mobile, Alabama, no report having been made as yet in the case.

ARKANSAS POST-ROUTES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HYNES] asks unanimous consent for the purpose of taking up for action at this time a bill to establish certain post-routes in the State of Arkansas, containing no other legislation whatever. Is there any objection to the bill being taken up and considered at this time?

Mr. HYNES. It is merely for the establishment of certain post-routes in the State of Arkansas.

There was no objection.

The House proceeded to the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 593) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. HYNES. There is no legislation whatever in the bill, and I hope it will be put on its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HYNES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. POLAND, at (half-past four o'clock p. m.,) the House took a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873."

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move on page 629, in section 2512, in lines 7 and 8, to strike out these words, "such place as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct," and insert "Eastport;" so it will read:

SEC. 2512. There shall be in the State of Maine fourteen collection districts, as follows:

First. The district of Aroostook; to comprise the county of Aroostook as bounded on the 22d day of February, 1869; in which Houlton shall be the only port of entry.

Second. The district of Passamaquoddy; in which Eastport shall be a port of entry and delivery; and the towns of Calais, Pembroke, and Robbinston ports of delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 630, in line 40, to strike out "and Alna," strike out "s" after the word "ports," and insert "a" before "port;" so it will read:

Ninth. The district of Wiscasset; in which Wiscasset shall be the port of entry, and Booth Bay a port of delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 630, section 2513, at the end of the third line, to insert, "who shall reside at Houlton;" after the word "collector," in fourth line, "who shall reside at Eastport;" at the end of the eighth line insert, "who shall reside at Machias;" at the end of the ninth line insert, "who shall reside at Ellsworth," and at the end of the tenth line insert, "who shall reside at Castine;" so it will read:

SEC. 2513. There shall be in the collection districts in the State of Maine the following officers:

First. In the district of Aroostook, a collector, who shall reside at Houlton.

Second. In the district of Passamaquoddy, a collector, who shall reside at Eastport, a deputy collector to reside at the port of Calais, and at Eastport a surveyor, to be called the surveyor of Eastport and the district of Passamaquoddy.

Third. In the district of Machias, a collector, who shall reside at Machias.

Fourth. In the district of Frenchman's Bay, a collector, who shall reside at Ellsworth.

Fifth. In the district of Castine, a collector, who shall reside at Castine.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendments to the remainder of section 2513, pages 630 and 631:

Add at end of line 13, "who shall reside at Belfast."
Add at end of line 14, "who shall reside at Waldoborough."
Add at end of line 15, "who shall reside at Wiscasset."
Add at end of line 16, "who shall reside at Bath."
Add at end of line 17, "who shall reside at Portland."
Add at end of line 22, "who shall reside at Kennebunk."
Add at end of line 23, "who shall reside at York."

So it will read:

Sixth. In the district of Bangor, a collector and a deputy collector, who shall reside at Frankfort.

Seventh. In the district of Belfast, a collector, who shall reside at Belfast.

Eighth. In the district of Waldoborough, a collector, who shall reside at Waldoborough.

Ninth. In the district of Wiscasset, a collector, who shall reside at Wiscasset.

Tenth. In the district of Bath, a collector, who shall reside at Bath.

Eleventh. In the district of Portland and Falmouth, a collector, who shall reside at Portland, not exceeding three deputy collectors, a surveyor, an appraiser, and an assistant appraiser.

Twelfth. In the district of Saco, a collector, who may reside at Saco or Biddeford.

Thirteenth. In the district of Kennebunk, a collector, who shall reside at Kennebunk, Fourteenth. In the district of York, a collector, who shall reside at York.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like the gentleman from Vermont to tell us if this is new legislation.

Mr. POLAND. Not at all.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If this is a mere collation of the statutes, how does it become necessary to add the place of residence?

Mr. POLAND. The statute in nearly all the collection districts provides where the collector shall live. In some instances the revisers have put that in. In most instances they have left it out. This is to supply what is found in the statute. The difficulty about making any general provision is that the statutes are different.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does the law now by any general provision, require the collectors to live in any particular place in the district?

Mr. POLAND. No, sir.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If not, how is it that it becomes necessary to insert here, in this collation, the place where they shall reside?

Mr. POLAND. The provisions of the statutes in reference to where the collectors shall reside are generally found in the statutes relating to collection districts. Some of the statutes say the collector shall reside at the port of entry. Generally the place is named, and in some instances the revisers have incorporated it. In some instances it is in the revision, in others it is not. The instances where we have inserted it are the cases where the revisers have omitted it. We insert it nowhere except where we find it in the statute, and we put it in as we do find it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It seems as if this thing had been very loosely and carelessly done when we find so many places left out.

Mr. POLAND. The revisers in many instances have left the places out. We thought they should be in, and therefore we have taken great pains to hunt up all these statutes, and to put in all they provide.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2518 by adding "who shall reside at Portsmouth;" so it will read:

SEC. 2518. There shall be in the district of Portsmouth a collector and a surveyor, who shall reside at Portsmouth.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

In section 2521, page 632, line 2, after the word "collector," insert "who shall reside at Burlington;" so it will read:

SEC. 2521. There shall be in the district of Vermont a collector, who shall reside at Burlington, and, at the discretion of the President, two surveyors for such ports of delivery as shall be designated by him.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On pages 632 and 633, section 2522, in line 18, strike out "Beverly and;" insert "a" after "Danvers," and substitute "port" for "ports;" in line 48 strike out "seventy" and insert "ninety;" in line 66 strike out "Dighton;" so the section, as regards the third, ninth, and eleventh districts of Massachusetts, will read as follows:

Third. The district of Salem and Beverly; to comprise all the waters and shores within the towns of Beverly, Salem, and Danvers, as bounded on the 2d day of March, 1799; in which Salem shall be the port of entry, and Danvers a port of delivery.

Ninth. The district of Edgartown: to comprise all the waters and shores within the county of Duke's County, as bounded on the 2d day of March, 1799; in which Edgartown shall be the port of entry.

Eleventh. The district of Fall River: to comprise all the waters and shores on Taunton River, and in the town of Rehoboth, as bounded on the 2d day of March, 1799, and all that part of the town of Tiverton, in Rhode Island, north of the south line of the farm of William Slade, and of the farm of the heirs of Boylston Brayton, as bounded on the 9th day of August, 1842, to Wattuper Pond, and by that pond to the south line of the State of Massachusetts, and the waters and shores adjoining thereto; in which Fall River shall be the port of entry and delivery, and Swansea, Somerset, Freetown, Berkley, and Taunton ports of delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Amend section 2524 so that it will read:

SEC. 2524. There shall be in the collection districts in the State of Massachusetts the following officers:

First. In the district of Newburyport, a collector and a surveyor, who shall reside at Newburyport.

Second. In the district of Gloucester, a collector and a surveyor, who shall reside at Gloucester.

Third. In the district of Salem and Beverly, a collector and a surveyor, who shall reside at Salem.

Fourth. In the district of Marblehead, a collector, who shall reside at Marblehead.

Fifth. In the district of Boston and Charlestown, a collector, a naval officer, a surveyor, who shall reside at Boston, two appraisers, and two assistant appraisers, a special examiner of drugs, medicines, and chemicals; and the Secretary of the Treasury may appoint an inspector of customs for the port of Chelsea.

Sixth. In the district of Plymouth, a collector, who shall reside at Plymouth, Seventh. In the district of Barnstable, a collector, who shall reside at Barnstable.

Eighth. In the district of Nantucket, a collector, who shall reside at Nantucket.

Ninth. In the district of Edgartown, a collector, who shall reside at Edgartown.

Tenth. In the district of New Bedford, a collector, who shall reside at New Bedford.

Eleventh. In the district of Fall River, a collector, who shall reside at Fall River.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It would seem that all those amendments might have been included in one by saying these officers should reside at the town after which the district is named.

Mr. POLAND. The laws are so diverse in relation to that that it was impossible to make any general provision that would include them all.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Amend section 2527, page 635, so that it will read:

SEC. 2527. There shall be in the collection districts in the State of Rhode Island the following officers:

First. In the district of Newport, a collector, who shall reside at Newport.

Second. In the district of Bristol and Warren, a collector, who shall reside at Bristol.

Third. In the district of Providence, a collector and an appraiser, who shall reside at Providence.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Amend section 2528, page 635, so that, as regards the fourth and fifth districts of Connecticut, it will read as follows:

Fourth. The district of New Haven: to comprise the waters and shores from the west line of the district of Middletown westerly to Housatonic River; in which New Haven shall be the port of entry, and Guilford, Branford, Milford, and Derby ports of delivery.

Fifth. The district of Fairfield: to comprise all the waters and shores in the State of Connecticut west of the district of New Haven; in which Fairfield shall be the port of entry, and Norwalk, Stratford, Stamford, and Greenwich ports of delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Amend section 2529, page 636, so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 2529. There shall be in the collection districts of the State of Connecticut the following officers:

First. In the district of Stonington, a collector and a surveyor, who shall reside at Stonington.

Second. In the district of New London, a collector, who shall reside at New London.

Third. In the district of Middletown, a collector, who shall reside at Middletown.

Fourth. In the district of New Haven, a collector, who shall reside at New Haven.

Fifth. In the district of Fairfield, a collector, who may reside at Fairfield or Bridgeport.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Amend section 2530, page 636, so that, as regards the third and fifth collection districts of New York, it will read as follows:

Third. The district of Champlain: to comprise all the waters and shores of Lake Champlain and the rivers connected therewith within the State of New York, and to extend westwardly along the northern boundary line of the State to the river Saint Lawrence; in which Plattsburgh shall be the port of entry, and Whitehall and Fort Covington ports of delivery.

Fifth. The district of Cape Vincent; to comprise all the waters and shores of the river Saint Lawrence from the western boundary of the county of Saint Lawrence as bounded on the 2d day of March, 1811, and all the waters and shores of Lake Ontario, and the rivers and waters connected therewith, within the jurisdiction of the United States, and within the State of New York, to the western extremity of Hungry Bay; in which Cape Vincent shall be the port of entry.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2531, so that the last part will read as follows:

Fifth. In the district of Cape Vincent, a collector, who shall reside at Vincent.

Sixth. In the district of Oswego, a collector, who shall reside at Oswego.

Seventh. In the district of Genesee, a collector, who shall reside on the Genesee River.

Eighth. In the district of Niagara, a collector, who shall reside at Suspension bridge.

Ninth. In the district of Buffalo Creek, a collector, who shall reside at Buffalo, and an appraiser.

Tenth. In the district of Dunkirk, a collector, who shall reside at Dunkirk; and for each of the ports of Barcelona, Silver Creek, and Cattaraugus Creek, a deputy collector.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2536, so that the last paragraph will read:

Sixth. The district of Burlington: to comprise all the waters and shores of the Delaware River, within the State of New Jersey, northward of the northern boundary of the county of Gloucester, as bounded on the 2d day of March, 1799; in which Burlington shall be the port of entry and Lamberton the port of delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2537, so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 2537. There shall be in the collection districts of the State of New Jersey the following officers:

First. In the district of Newark, a collector, who shall reside at Newark.

Second. In the district of Perth Amboy, a collector, who shall reside at Perth Amboy.

Third. In the district of Little Egg Harbor, a collector, who shall reside at Tuckertown.

Fourth. In the district of Great Egg Harbor, a collector, who shall reside at such place within the district as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Fifth. In the district of Bridgeton, a collector, who shall reside at Bridgeton.

Sixth. In the district of Burlington, a collector, who shall reside at Lamberton,

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2538, by striking out of line 7 the words "Delaware City;" so that that portion will read:

First. The district of Philadelphia: to comprise all the waters and shores of the Delaware River, and the rivers and waters connected therewith, within the State of Pennsylvania, and the port of Camden, in New Jersey; in which Philadelphia shall be the port of entry, and Camden and Chester ports of delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2539, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 2539. There shall be in the collection districts of the State of Pennsylvania the following officers:

First. In the district of Philadelphia, a collector, a naval officer, a surveyor, two appraisers, and two assistant appraisers, who shall reside at the port of Philadelphia; a special examiner of drugs, medicines, and chemicals; an assistant collector, who shall reside at Camden, and shall have power to enter and clear vessels in like manner as the collector of Philadelphia, but shall act in conformity to such instructions and regulations as he shall from time to time receive from the collector of Philadelphia; and an inspector, who shall reside at Chester, and have the powers of a deputy collector.

Second. In the district of Erie, a collector, who shall reside at Erie.

Third. In the district of Pittsburgh, a surveyor and appraiser.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2543, by striking out "Nanjemoy" as one of the ports of delivery in the Annapolis collection district.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. Amend section 2544 so that the first portion of it will read as follows:

SEC. 2544. There shall be in the collection districts in the State of Maryland the following officers:

First. In the eastern district, a collector, who shall reside at Crisfield.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2546 by striking out the words, "who shall not be required to reside at Georgetown;" so that it will read:

That there shall be in the district of Georgetown a collector.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2547 by striking out the words "Accomack Court-House and Chincoteague" as ports of delivery in the Cherrystone collection district of Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend the same section, in the paragraph relating to the Yorktown collection district, by inserting the words "East River" after the words "West Point," in line 31; so that that paragraph will read as follows:

Fourth. The district of Yorktown: to comprise all the waters and shores from the point forming the south shore of the mouth of Rappahannock River to the point forming the south shore of the mouth of York River, and from the mouth of York River to West Point, and from West Point to the highest navigable waters of the Pamunkey and Mattapony Rivers; in which Yorktown shall be the port of entry, and West Point, East River, and Cumberland ports of delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend the paragraph relating to the Portsmouth district so that it will read as follows:

Fifth. The district of Norfolk and Portsmouth: to comprise all the waters and shores within the State of Virginia southward of the district of Yorktown, not included in the districts of Petersburgh and Richmond; in which Norfolk and Portsmouth shall be the sole port of entry, and Suffolk, Smithfield, and Hampton ports of delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2548 so as to provide that in the district of Cherrystone the collector shall reside at Cherrystone.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out section 2550, and to insert in lieu thereof the section which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 2550. The master of any vessel, bound to any district of James River above Sewal's Point, shall, before passing the point, and immediately after his arrival either at the same or at Hampton Road, deposit with the collector of the port of Norfolk and Portsmouth a true manifest of the cargo on board such vessel. The collector shall, after registering the manifest, transmit the same, duly certified to have been so deposited, to the officer with whom the entries are to be made. The collector may, whenever he deems it necessary for the security of the revenue, put an inspector of the customs on board any such vessel, to accompany the same until her arrival at the first port of entry or delivery, in the district to which she is destined. Every master or commander who neglects or omits to deposit a manifest as aforesaid, or refuses to receive an inspector of the customs on board, as the case shall require, shall be liable to a penalty of $500, to be recovered with costs of suit, one half for the use of the officer with whom such manifest ought to have been deposited, and the other half for the use of the collector of the district to which the vessel may be bound.

The Clerk read the proposed new section, as follows:

It shall be the duty of the master of the revenue-cutter at the mouth of the James River, under the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury, to board all vessels bound up the said river, to indorse their manifests, and to place an officer on board of each vessel having a cargo from a foreign port; that whenever there shall be no revenue-cutter on that station, or when the state of the weather shall be such as to render it impracticable to send an officer on board of any such vessel, the captain is hereby authorized and directed to deposit with the surveyor at Hampton a copy of the manifest of the cargo on board of such vessel.

Mr. POLAND. The provisions contained in the section printed in this revision, regulating vessels going up James River, are superseded by a later statute, which later statute is embraced in the proposed new section.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The section as printed in this revision contains some provisions not embraced in the proposed substitute.

Mr. POLAND. The early act which is copied in this revision was repealed and a new provision made in regard to vessels and officers of the revenue at the mouth of James River.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The section which it is proposed to strike out provides for penalties in case of non-performance of the duties prescribed.

Mr. POLAND. That is repealed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is the whole of the section repealed? It seems to me that the provision of the section is a very wholesome one, and I can see no reason why it should be superseded by a section which provides no penalties in case the manifest is not filed as provided.

Mr. POLAND. I think the whole of the section as printed in the revision has been repealed. I will examine the statutes again, and if I find that we are in error, I will bring the matter up again.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2551, in relation to the district of Albemarle, by striking out the words "and Plymouth, Windsor, and Winton ports of delivery," at the end of the paragraph; so that it will read as follows:

First. The district of Albemarle: to comprise Albemarle, Currituck, and Croatan Sounds, and all the waters and shores adjacent to and flowing into those sounds south of the southern boundary line of the State of Virginia, together with that part of Pamlico Sound north of and including Loggerhead Inlet, and all the waters and shores appertaining thereto; in which Edenton shall be the port of entry.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend the paragraph in relation to the district of Pamlico, by changing the name of the port of entry from "New Berne" to "Newbern." The former spelling is the one used in the earlier statutes, but of late years the latter spelling has been used.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move further to amend the same paragraph by striking out at the end these words: "and Washington a port of delivery."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2552, so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 2552. There shall be in the collection-districts in the State of North Carolina the following officers:

First. In the district of Albemarle, a collector, to reside at the port of entry.

Second. In the district of Pamlico, a collector, to reside at the port of entry.

Third. In the district of Beaufort, a collector, to reside at the port of entry.

Fourth. In the district of Wilmington, a collector, to reside at the port of entry.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Why does not the gentleman use in this case the same language that he used in former provisions? Here he uses the language, "reside at the port of entry;" in the former provisions he used the specific name of the place.

Mr. POLAND. We follow the language of the statute. We make it so here because the statute says so.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is it the opinion of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] that that alters the meaning in any respect, or does he not know?

Mr. POLAND. The port of entry might be changed from one place to another in the district.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2553 by striking out the words "Savannah River" and inserting the words "Back River, in Georgia;" so that that portion of the section will read as follows:

Third. The district of Beaufort: to comprise all the waters and shores from Combahee River to the Back River, in Georgia; in which Beaufort shall be the port of entry.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2554 by inserting after "surveyor," in line 5, the words "who shall reside at Charleston;" so that that portion of the section will read as follows:

Second. In the district of Charleston, a collector, a naval officer, a surveyor, who shall reside at Charleston, two appraisers, and a special examiner of drugs, medicines, and chemicals.

Also, to insert after that paragraph the following:

Third. In the district of Beaufort, a collector.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2555 by striking out of the paragraph relating to the district of Saint Mary's the words "and Saint Illa and Jeffersonton ports of delivery."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2556 so as to provide that the collector in the district of Saint Mary's shall reside at Saint Mary's.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2559 so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 2559. There shall be in the collection districts in the State of Florida the following officers:

First. In the district of Fernandina, a collector.

Second. In the district of Saint John's, a collector, who shall reside at such place as the President may designate as a port of entry, and a surveyor, who shall reside at Pilatka.

Third. In the district of Saint Augustine, a collector, who shall reside at Saint Augustine.

Fourth. In the district of Key West, a collector, who shall reside at Key West.

Fifth. In the district of Saint Mark's, a collector, who shall reside at Cedar Keys, and a surveyor, who shall reside at Bayport.

Sixth. In the district of Apalachicola, a collector, who shall reside at the port of entry.

Seventh. In the district of Pensacola, a collector, who shall reside at Pensacola.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2564, in the paragraph relating to New Orleans, by inserting as a port of delivery the following:

Pittsburgh, in Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend section 2566, so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 2565. There shall be in the collection districts in the State of Louisiana the following officers:

First. In the district of New Orleans, a collector, a naval officer, a surveyor, two appraisers, and one assistant appraiser, and a special examiner of drugs, medicines, and chemicals, who shall reside at the port of New Orleans; a deputy collector, who shall reside at Shreveport, in the State of Louisiana; and for each of the other ports of delivery named in the preceding section a surveyor, who shall reside at such port, and shall, in addition to the customary duties devolving upon such officer, perform the duties specially prescribed by law with respect to merchandise imported into that particular port. And for each of the ports of Cincinnati, Louisville, Evansville, Saint Louis, and Memphis, there shall be appointed an appraiser, who shall reside at such port.

Second. In the district of Teche, a collector, who shall reside at Brashear.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to strike out section 2572, and to insert in lieu the section which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The section referred to was as follows:

SEC. 2572. The master of any vessel destined for the port of Natchez shall stop at New Orleans, and deliver to the collector for the district of New Orleans a manifest of the cargo on board such vessel. If he shall fail to do so, he shall be liable to a penalty of $5,000. The collector for the district of New Orleans shall transmit a certified copy of such manifest to the collector for the district of Natchez, and shall direct an inspector to go on board such vessel and proceed with her to the port of Natchez and there report such vessel to the collector for the district of Natchez immediately after his arrival; from which report the duty of the inspector shall cease.

The Clerk read the proposed new section as follows:

That any vessel proceeding to the port of Natchez, from any port or place in foreign countries, shall stop and report her arrival at the port of New Orleans; and before such vessel shall proceed on her voyage to the port of Natchez, it shall be the duty of the collector of the port of New Orleans to order on board such vessel a custom-house officer, who shall remain on board such vessel until her arrival at the port of Natchez; and it shall be the duty of such custom-house officer to take possession of and safely keep all the papers belonging to such vessel having reference to the freight or cargo on board, which papers he shall deliver to the collector of the port of Natchez immediately after his arrival at such port. And any such vessel which shall depart from the port of New Orleans without such officer on board shall be subject to all the pains and penalties provided for by law for a violation of the revenue laws of the United States. And the expenses of the custom-house officer who may be put on board of any such vessel at New Orleans, from the time of his being put on board until his return to New Orleans, shall be paid by the owner or owners of such vessel.

Mr. POLAND. This is very like the case in relation to the arrangement about vessels at the mouth of James River. The revisers have copied the earlier statute, which has been superseded by a later one, which is embraced in the proposed new section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, page 650, section 2575, line 13, to insert "Copano" after "Matagorda;" and in lines 23 and 24 to strike out all after the word "entry," in line 23—to strike out these words, "and Point Isabel a port of delivery."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, page 651, section 2576, at the end of line 10, to insert, "and a surveyor, who shall reside at Copano;" at the end of line 11, same section, to insert "who shall reside at Corpus Christi;" so it will read:

SEC. 2576. There shall be, in the collection districts in the State of Texas, the following officers:

First. In the district of Galveston, a collector, who shall reside at Galveston; a deputy collector, who shall reside at Sabine, and shall exercise such powers as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe in pursuance of law; a surveyor, who shall reside at Velasco, and a surveyor who shall reside at Houston.

Second. In the district of Saluria, a collector, who shall reside at Indianola, a surveyor who shall reside at Matagorda, and a surveyor who shall reside at Lavaca, and a surveyor who shall reside at Copano.

Third. In the district of Corpus Christi, a collector, who shall reside at Corpus Christi.

Fourth. In the district of Brazos de Santiago, a collector, who shall reside at Brownsville; and a deputy collector, who shall reside at Brazos de Santiago, and shall have the power to enter and clear vessels.

Fifth. In the district of Paso del Norte, a collector, who shall reside at El Paso.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on same page, section 2579, to insert "and" before "Vallejo," and to strike out "Santa Cruz, Stockton, Benicia, Monterey, and Sacramento," in lines 11 and 12; so it will read:

SEC. 2579. There shall be in the State of California two collection districts, as follows:

First. The district of San Diego: to comprise all the waters and shores of the counties of Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, San Bernardino, and San Diego; in which San Diego, on the Bay of San Diego, shall be the sole port of entry, and San Pedro and Santa Barbara ports of delivery.

Second. The district of San Francisco: to comprise all the waters and shores of the State north of the counties of Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, and San Bernardino; in which San Francisco shall be the port of entry, and Eureka and Vallejo ports of delivery.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I should like to know by what law there are two collection districts in the State of California?

Mr. POLAND. I will answer the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is by reason of a recent act of March, 1873.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Read it.

Mr. POLAND. It is as follows:

That the counties of Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, San Bernardino, and San Diego, in the State of California, are hereby detached from the collector's district of San Francisco, and all the territory, ports, harbors, rivers and waters of said counties shall constitute a collection district by the name of San Diego district, and the city of San Diego, on the bay of San Diego, established as a sole port of entry for said district; and the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a collector to reside at said port, whose compensation shall be $3,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move on page 652, in section 2580, in line 3, after the word "collector," to insert "who shall reside at San Diego;" after line 5 insert "for the ports of San Pedro and Santa Barbara;" and in line 7, after "surveyor," insert "who shall reside at San Francisco;" so it will read:

SEC. 2580. There shall be in the collection districts of California the following officers:

First. In the district of San Diego, a collector, who shall reside at San Diego, and two inspectors, to be appointed by the collector, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the ports of San Pedro and Santa Barbara.

Second. In the district of San Francisco, a collector, a naval officer, a surveyor, who shall reside at San Francisco, two appraisers, two assistant appraisers, and a special examiner of drugs, medicines, and chemicals; a deputy collector who shall reside at Eureka, a deputy collector who shall reside at Vallejo, an inspector at Monterey, an inspector at Sacramento, an inspector at Benicia, and an inspector at Stockton.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on page 652, section 2583, in line 7, to strike out "out at," before "Gardner;" in line 16, to strike out the words "and Pacific City and Nisqually, ports of delivery;" and in lines 23 and 24, to strike out all after the word "entry," as follows: "and Milwaukee a port of delivery."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on page 653, section 2584, in lines 9 and 10, to strike out all after the word "Astoria," as follows: "a surveyor who shall reside at Pacific City, and a surveyor who shall reside at Nisqually;" in lines 12 and 15, strike out after the word "Portland," "and a surveyor who shall reside at Milwaukee;" and in line 14, to insert after "collector," "who shall reside at Port Townshend;" so it will read:

SEC. 2584. There shall be in the collection districts in the State of Oregon and the Territory of Washington the following officers:

First. In the southern district of Oregon, a collector, who shall reside at Empire City, and three deputy collectors, who may be appointed by the collector, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of whom one shall reside at Ellensberg, one at Port Orford, and one at Gardner.

Second. In the district of Oregon, a collector, who shall reside at Astoria.

Third. In the district of Willamette, a collector, and an appraiser who shall reside at Portland, and a surveyor who shall reside at Milwaukee.

Fourth. In the district of Puget Sound, a collector, who shall reside at Townshend.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on page 653, section 2584, line 7, to substitute "Gardner" for "Gardiner."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on page 654, section 2589, at the end of line 2, to insert after the word "collector," "who shall reside at Sitka;" so it will read:

SEC. 2589. There shall be in the collection district of Alaska a collector, who shall reside at Sitka.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on the same page, section 2691, at the end of line 2, after the word "collector," to insert "who shall reside at the port of entry."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on the same page, section 2593, at the end of line 5, to insert "who shall reside at Du Luth."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move, on the same page, section 2594, in line 1, to strike out "two" and "one;" so it will read:

SEC. 2594. There shall be in the State of Wisconsin one collection district, as follows.

In line 3 strike out "first" and insert "fourth;" then transfer the whole paragraph, from line 3 to line 15, inclusive, which is as follows:

Fourth. The district of Superior: to comprise all the waters and shores of that part of the upper peninsula of the State of Michigan lying east of the principal meridian, all the islands in and bordering upon the Sainte Marie River, and all that part of the State of Michigan lying west of the principal meridian and north of the latitudinal line dividing township number 43 from township number 44 north of the base-line of that State, including the territory in the State bordering Green Bay, together with all the islands, waters, and shores of Lake Superior, and the adjacent territory to the head-waters of all the rivers and streams tributary thereto and within the States of Michigan and Wisconsin; in which Marquette shall be the port of entry, and Sault Sainte Marie and Mackinaw ports of delivery—to page 655, after line 21, section 2596; and in the same section strike out "second" in the sixteenth line and insert "and;" and strike out "Kenosha and Manitowoc" in line 19.

I will give a word of explanation in reference to the change. There was a collection district in what is termed the Upper Peninsula of Michigan. A part of that collection district was in Michigan and a part of it was in Wisconsin originally. But, by the present arrangement, that district is all in Michigan. The revisers, by some mistake, as this formerly embraced part of Wisconsin, had put it in as a district of Wisconsin. This amendment transfers it to the Michigan district. There is but one collection district in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. ELDREDGE. This leaves it just as it was.

Mr. POLAND. It leaves it just as it is. There are four districts in Michigan and only one in Wisconsin. The revisers had put two in Wisconsin and three in Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER. I would inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] in regard to Southport and Kenosha, which is the present name of the place.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I do not know what the statute means, and I have not been able to get anything out of the gentleman from Vermont as to what it means. He says he does not know, and of course it is of no use for me to ask. But I know that the place now called Kenosha used to be called Southport; that is a good many years ago. And I should be very much surprised if the recent legislation in reference to it had not called the place by its right name—that is, Kenosha, which is the proper name of the place now.

Mr. POLAND. The same statutes speak of Kenosha and Southport. If there is a confusion of names it is the fault of whoever made the statute.

Mr. FIELD. It is notorious that what was Southport is now Kenosha. I move to strike out "Southport" and retain "Kenosha."

Mr. POLAND. I think perhaps we should not be too rash in making that change. We have spent a great deal of time in looking through the statutes, and we find that the same statute names both.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I see that both are named here, and I would suggest that the question be referred to some gentleman on the committee, who, when he has examined it, has an opinion on the subject.

Mr. POLAND. Very likely it will be.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan insist on his amendment?

Mr. POLAND. If there is any error about it we will take great pleasure in having it corrected.

Mr. FIELD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Amend section 2595, line 655, so it will read as follows:

There shall be in the collection district of Wisconsin the following officers: In the district of Milwaukee, a collector and an appraiser, who shall reside at Milwaukee, and a deputy collector at each of the ports of Southport, Racine, Sheboygan, Green Bay, and Depère.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Amend section 2596, page 655, so that it will read:

SEC. 2596. There shall be in the State of Michigan four collection districts, as follows:

First. The district of Michigan: to comprise all the waters and shores of the State of Michigan lying west of the principal meridian and south of the latitudinal line dividing township number 43 from township number 44 north of the base-line of the State, except the territory bordering Green Bay, and including the island of Bois Blanc; in which Grand Haven shall be the port of entry, and Duncan City a point of delivery.

Second. The district of Huron: to comprise all the waters and shores of the Saint Clair River, and of the counties of Saint Clair, Lapeer, Tuscola, and Saginaw, as bounded on the 13th day of April, 1866, and of all the territory of the State of Michigan lying north of those counties and east of the principal meridian; in which Port Huron shall be the port of entry.

Third. The district of Detroit: to comprise all the waters and shores of Lake Erie and Lake Saint Clair, and the waters connected therewith, within the jurisdiction of the United States, from the Miami River to the mouth of the Saint Clair River; in which Detroit shall be the port of entry. And the President is authorized to establish within the district of Detroit two ports of delivery.

Fourth. The district of Superior: to comprise all the waters and shores of that part of the upper peninsula of the State of Michigan lying east of the principal meridian, all the islands in and bordering upon the Sainte Marie River, and all that part of the State of Michigan lying west of the principal meridian and north of the latitudinal line dividing township number 43 from township number 44 north of the base-line of that State, including the territory in the State bordering Green Bay, together with all the islands, waters, and shores of Lake Superior and the adjacent territory to the head-waters of all the rivers and streams tributary thereto and within the States of Michigan and Wisconsin; in which Marquette shall be the port of entry, and Sault Sainte Marie and Mackinaw ports of delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Amend section 2597, line 655, so it will read as follows:

SEC. 2597. There shall be in the collection districts of Michigan the following officers:

First. In the district of Michigan, a collector, who shall reside at Grand Haven.

Second. In the district of Huron, a collector, who shall reside at Port Huron.

Third. In the district of Detroit, a collector, and an appraiser who shall reside at Detroit, and a surveyor at each of the two ports of delivery designated by the President.

Fourth. In the district of Superior, a collector, who shall reside at Marquette, a deputy collector who shall reside at Sault Sainte Marie, and a deputy collector who shall reside at Mackinaw.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Amend section 2600, page 656, so that, as regards the second district of Ohio, it will read:

Second. The district of Sandusky: to comprise all the waters and shores of Lake Erie within the jurisdiction of the United States, from the western bank of the Vermillion River to the western cape of Sandusky Bay, in which Sandusky shall be the port of entry.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Amend section 2601, page 656, so that it will read:

SEC. 2601. There shall be in the collection districts of Ohio the following officers:

First. In the district of Miami, a collector, who shall reside at Toledo.

Second. In the district of Sandusky, a collector, who shall reside at Sandusky.

Third. In the district of Cuyahoga, a collector, who shall reside at Cleveland; and an appraiser at Cleveland.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment:

On page 662, line 21, strike out "Bridgeport" and insert "Fairfield."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I offer the following amendment to section 2624, on page 664, relating to the duties of surveyor:

Strike out lines 23 to 27 inclusive, as follows:

Sixth. To examine and ascertain the quality, kind, and quantity of all wines imported, and the quantity and kind of all teas and sugars imported.

Seventh. To grant certificates for imported spirits and wines, and make returns thereof, in manner hereafter provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELDREDGE. On page 661, section 2616, there is a provision that—

Every collector, naval officer, and surveyor shall, before entering on the duties of his office, give a bond to the United States, with one or more sufficient sureties, for the true and faithful discharge of the duties thereof according to law, under penalty as follows.

The law provides that the bond shall be approved by somebody, I believe; but there is no provision in this section for the approval of the bond. The law provides that it shall be approved by the Commissioner of Customs.

Mr. POLAND. That provision will be found in another place.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It will be found on the next page, in section 2617.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That seems to cover it, I think.

Mr. POLAND. In reference to the amendment on page 664, in the provisions relating to the duties of surveyors, I wish to say that since those provisions were adopted a new class of officers—the appraisers—have been created by law; and these duties have been devolved upon them.

I move further to amend by striking out in section 2634 the word "or," and inserting the word "on" before the word "exportation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out the whole of section 2655.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2655. There shall be allowed the following fees to the measurers, weighers, or gaugers, respectively, to be paid monthly by the collector out of the revenue, and charged to the United States:

First. For the measurement of every one hundred bushels of grain, forty-five cents.

Second. For the measurement of every one hundred bushels of salt, according to the weight established by law for the payment of duties thereon, seventy-five cents.

Third. For the measurement of every one hundred bushels of coal, ninety cents.

Fourth. For the weighing of every one hundred and twelve pounds, and marking every cask, box, or package, weighing more than two hundred pounds each, except sugar, coffee, pepper, pimento, and indigo, in bales, bags, mats, canisters, or seroons, with the weight, in durable characters, in the districts of Pennsylvania, New York, Boston and Charlestown, and Baltimore, one cent and seven-eighths; in the district of Norfolk, two cents and a quarter; and in the other districts, three cents.

Fifth. For the gauging and marking every cask, to be marked in durable characters, with his own name and the quantity, twelve cents.

Sixth. For computing the contents of and marking cases containing distilled spirits and wines, four cents and a half per case.

Seventh. For actually counting the number of bottles of cider, beer, ale, perry, or porter, contained in any cask, or other package or packages, one cent and a half per dozen; and in proportion for any greater or lesser quantity.

These allowances shall be deemed to include a compensation for making returns of the merchandise weighed, gauged, and measured, specifying the quality as well as quantity.

Mr. POLAND. In reference to this amendment, I will state that weighers and gaugers were originally paid by certain fees as prescribed here, those fees being paid, not by the owners of the goods, but out of the revenue, and charged to the United States. All those officers are now paid stated salaries.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I also move to amend by striking out "forty" and inserting "fifty" in line 3 of section 2656.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I wish also to move an amendment to section 2753.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2753. The assistant appraisers at the port of New York shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year, expenses of collecting the revenue, and paid to them in each, to be paid out of the appropriation for defraying the expenses of collecting the revenue, and paid to them in monthly payments, and in due proportion for any period less than one month for the time they may actually serve.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out in the second and third lines the words "expenses of collecting the revenue and paid to them in each."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I have also an amendment to offer to section 2755.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2755. Each inspector shall receive, for every day he shall be actually employed in aid of the customs, a sum not exceeding four dollars; and for every other person that the collector may find it necessary and expedient to employ, as occasional inspector, or in any other way in aid of the revenue, a like sum, while actually so employed, not exceeding three dollars for every day so employed, to be paid by the collector out of the revenue, and charged to the United States.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out in the second and third lines the words "a sum not exceeding four," and inserting the word "three." The old pay of the inspectors as fixed by law was three dollars a day. By a subsequent act, to be found in section 2760, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to increase the compensation not exceeding one dollar per day. As that provision has been incorporated in the revision, section 2755 should stand as it is in the old law, so that the Secretary shall not be authorized to allow a dollar a day additional to four dollars a day.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I wish also to offer amendments to section 2794.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2794. Vessels which are not vessels of the United States shall be admitted to unlade at the following ports only; and no such vessel shall be admitted to make entry in any other district than in the one in which she shall be admitted to unlade:

First. In the State of Maine: Portland and Falmouth, Bath, Ellsworth, Wiscasset, Machias, and Penobscot.

Second. In the State of New Hampshire: Portsmouth.

Third. In the State of Massachusetts: New Bedford, Fall River, Salem and Beverly, Gloucester, Newburyport, Marblehead, Nantucket, Boston and Charlestown, and Plymouth.

Fourth. In the State of Rhode Island: Newport and Providence.

Fifth. In the State of Connecticut: New London, Middletown, Bridgeport, and New Haven.

Sixth. In the State of New York: New York.

Seventh. In the State of New Jersey: Perth Amboy and Burlington.

Eighth. In the State of Pennsylvania: Philadelphia.

Ninth. In the State of Delaware: Wilmington, New Castle, and Port Penn.

Tenth. In the State of Maryland: Baltimore, Annapolis, Town Creek, Nottingham, Digges's Landing, Snow Hill, and Carrolsburgh.

Eleventh. In the District of Columbia: Georgetown.

Twelfth. In the State of Virginia: Alexandria, Wicomico, Dumfries, Tappahannock, Port Royal, Fredericksburgh, Urbana, Yorktown, West Point, Hampton, Richmond, Petersburgh, and Norfolk and Portsmouth.

Thirteenth. In the State of North Carolina: Wilmington, New Berne, Beaufort, Edenton, and Plymouth.

Fourteenth. In the State of South Carolina: Charleston, Georgetown, and Beaufort.

Fifteenth. In the State of Georgia: Savannah, Sunbury, Brunswick, Frederica, and Saint Mary's.

Sixteenth. In the State of Louisiana: New Orleans.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out in the second line of the section the words "at the following ports only," and inserting "only at ports of entry established by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move further to amend by striking out the whole of this section after the first paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I move to amend by striking out section 2795.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 2795. Vessels arriving from the Cape of Good Hope, or from any place beyond the same, shall be admitted to make entry at the following ports only:

First. In the State of Maine: Portland and Falmouth, Bath, Castine, Bangor, Kennebunk, Saco, and the port of entry designated for the district of Passamaquoddy.

Second. In the State of New Hampshire: Portsmouth.

Third. In the State of Massachusetts Boston and Charlestown, New Bedford, Plymouth, Nantucket, Edgartown, Fall River, Newburyport, Salem and Beverly, Marblehead, and Gloucester.

Fourth. In the State of Rhode Island: Newport, Bristol and Warren, and Providence.

Fifth. In the State of Connecticut: New London and New Haven.

Sixth. In the State of New York: New York.

Seventh. In the State of New Jersey: Perth Amboy.

Eighth. In the State of Pennsylvania: Philadelphia.

Ninth. In the State of Delaware: Wilmington.

Tenth. In the State of Maryland; Baltimore and Annapolis.

Eleventh. In the District of Columbia: Georgetown.

Twelfth. In the State of Virginia: Alexandria, and Norfolk and Portsmouth.

Thirteenth. In the State of North Carolina: Wilmington, New Berne, and Edenton.

Fourteenth. In the State of South Carolina: Charleston, Georgetown, and Beaufort.

Fifteenth. In the State of Georgia: Savannah.

Sixteenth. In the State of Florida: Pensacola and Key West.

Seventeenth. In the State of Louisiana: New Orleans.

Mr. POLAND. The original statute from which this is copied provided that foreign vessels should land only at particular ports; but it embraced the whole list of ports of entry, which has been very much enlarged since. This second section provided that "vessels arriving from the Cape of Good Hope, or from any place beyond the same, shall be admitted to make entry at the following ports only," naming a very restricted number. These provisions have been changed by treaty, so far as concerns all the nations with which we have treaties; and if they were to be kept in force now, no foreign vessel could land on the Pacific coast at any port; because at the time the original act was passed we had no port on that coast. The committee regard the provisions of these two sections, except what we have left of the first section, as entirely superseded by later legislation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. With all the diligence I have been able to use, this is as far as I am prepared to go with amendments on behalf of the committee this evening. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.]

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I am happy to state to the House that upon all that part of the revision assigned to my special charge, I am able to report to-night with the exception of a single section, which, not yet having been able to make any sense of or to find where it came from, I have concluded to postpone to a future occasion.

The first amendment which I offer is to section 443, specifying the subordinate officers, clerks, employés of the Department of the Interior, and their respective salaries. I move to amend by inserting after line 27 of the section these words, "public documents, one superintendent at a salary of $2,500 a year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The next amendment which I wish to offer is to section 444.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 444. The Secretary of the Interior is charged with the supervision of public business relating to the following subjects:

First. The census, when directed by law.

Second. The public lands, including mines.

Third. Public buildings which are under the charge of the Chief of Engineers.

Fourth. The Indians.

Fifth. Pensions and bounty lands.

Sixth. Patents for inventions.

Seventh. The custody and distribution of publications.

Eighth. Education.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend by inserting at the end of the section the following:

Ninth. Government Hospital for the Insane.

Tenth. Columbia Hospital for the Deaf and Dumb.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I also move to amend by adding at the end of section 505 the following:

Congressional journals and public documents authorized to be distributed to institutions on the designation of members of Congress, shall be sent to such libraries and institutions only as shall signify a willingness to pay the cost of their transportation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I wish to move an amendment to section 4194.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4194. Vessels registered pursuant to law, and no others, except such as shall be duly qualified, according to law, for carrying on the coasting trade and fisheries, or one of them, shall be deemed vessels of the United States, and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels; but they shall not enjoy the same longer than they shall continue to be wholly owned by citizens and to be commanded by a citizen of the United States.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move to amend by inserting at the end of the section the following:

And officers of vessels of the United States shall in all cases be citizens of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The next amendment is to strike out "presumptive," and insert "prima facie," in section 4330; so that the section will read as follows:

SEC. 4330. The collector of the customs, at any port at which any vessel so employed shall arrive, or from which any such vessel shall be about to depart, shall appoint and direct one or more of the inspectors of the customs for such port to examine such vessel, and report in writing to him whether the requirements of law have been complied with in respect to such vessel; and if such report shall state such compliance, and shall be approved by such collector, it shall be deemed prima facie evidence thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I have also an amendment to section 4285, an amendment of considerable length, and which I do not know that I need explain, though there is a very curious explanation.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 4285. Upon vessels which shall be entered at any custom-house in the United States, from any foreign port or place, there shall be paid the respective duties following: On vessels of the United States, the officers of which are citizens of the United States, thirty cents a ton: on vessels of the United States, the officers of which are not citizens of the United States, eighty cents a ton; on vessels built within the United States, but belonging wholly or in part to subjects of foreign powers, sixty cents per ton; on foreign vessels entered in the United States from any foreign port to and with which vessels of the United States are not ordinarily permitted to enter and trade, $2.80 per ton; on other vessels, eighty cents per ton: Provided, That nothing in this section shall impair any rights or privileges which have been or may be acquired by any foreign nation, under the laws and treaties of the United States, relative to the duty of tonnage on vessels.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move the following amendments:

In line 4 strike out the words "the officers of which are citizens of the United States;" strike out from the word "on," in line 5, to the word "ton," inclusive, in line 6; in lines 11 and 12 strike out "eighty" and insert "thirty;" and after the word "ton," in line 12, insert the following:

Provided, That the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of any foreign nation to which such vessels belong, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished; otherwise 80 cents per ton and.

As a curious specimen of the way in which acts of Congress are sometimes expressed, it may, perhaps, be interesting to some gentlemen to know the length of time that it took the committee to find out what the duty should be under this section. The commissioners to revise the laws gave one rate of duty; the revision as here reported gave another and totally different one; and it was impossible to discover, without a very long comparison of statutes, how they came to differ or whence this one was derived. At length we found the difference arose from a very curious use of language in one of the statutes, to which the acute lawyer who revised the work gave one construction, and to which the commissioners gave another.

The statute provided certain discriminating duties in favor of one class of vessels should be repealed, while the practice of the Government was discrimination against the other should be repealed and the whole duties should be stricken out. It has been uniformly the construction since the time the statute was passed. It was capable of both constructions, and the revising lawyer took the other. The committee found out at last what it meant. I believe they have got it now conformably to the practice as well as to what we thought was the true meaning of the statute.

The motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. POLAND (at five minutes to nine o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ——: The petition of members of the North Alabama Bar for the extension of the jurisdiction of the circuit court of the United States for the fifth circuit over the northern district of Alabama, and for holding terms of the court at Huntsville, Montgomery, and Mobile, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 20, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, of Washington.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 447) extending the time for the completion of the Green Bay and Sturgeon Bay and Lake Michigan Ship-Canal, in the State of Michigan, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 886) to provide for the election of Congressmen at large for the State of Alabama was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The bill (H. R. No. 2080) to provide for deducting any debt due the United States from any judgment recovered against the United States by such debtor, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRESERVATION OF FORESTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith a "memorial upon the cultivation of timber and the preservation of forests," and a draught of a joint resolution prepared by the "American Association for the Advancement of Science;" together with a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office upon the same subject.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 19, 1874.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will lie on the table and be printed if there be no objection.

Mr. STEWART. I suggest that the question of growing timber is before the Committee on Public Lands, and it might be well for this communication to go to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and be printed, if there be no objection.

IMPORTATION OF FRUIT-PLANTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to make a statement to the Senate in regard to a matter which not only affects the Senate but affects other Departments of the Government, which has led already to the loss of half a million dollars of revenue, and may probably lead to reclamations of a larger amount.

A good deal has been said in the newspapers, and in another place that I need not refer to, in regard to an error that crept into the law of two years ago in regard to fruits, an error which has led to admitting oranges, lemons, pomegranates, and all fresh fruits, duty free, at a large sacrifice to the Treasury. I was anxious, as indeed every one ought to be, to see where this error originated, and I am very glad to find that it did not originate here. I have taken pains to hunt up all the original papers.

The bill of the House of Representatives, No. 2322, (Forty-second Congress, second session,) entitled "An act to reduce duties on imports and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," was reported by the Committee on Finance of the Senate on the 24th of May, 1872, and it contained in the free list the following articles:

Flowers, leaves, plants, roots, and seeds, (medicinal,) in a crude state, not otherwise provided for.

On the 25th day of May, 1872, while the bill was pending, the then Senator from Florida (Mr. Osborn) gave notice of his intention to offer an amendment to include in the free list the words "plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation." It seems, then, by the Globe that on the 30th of May following, the bill being under consideration, the Senator from Vermont made this remark:

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Before that question is put, I ask consent to offer an amendment that the Senator from Florida, not now here, [Mr. GILBERT,] desired me to present. It is to insert on page 25, section 5, after line 293—

"Fruit-plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation and cultivation."

I see no objection to it, and if the Senate does not, I ask to have it adopted. It is merely to allow them to be put on the free list.

The amendment was agreed to.

This amendment, then, was to admit "fruit-plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation and cultivation;" the word "fruit" being a word of limitation, confining the plants to be admitted free to those that bore fruit, and to exclude the idea of allowing all kinds of tropical fruits, which are articles of luxury and show, to be admitted duty free; clearly confining the free clause to fruit-plants. It was intended merely, as shown by the origin of the amendment of the two Senators from Florida, to enable them to get new varieties of orange and lemon trees duty free, and certainly not to admit lemons and oranges duty free. The amendment was agreed to in the Senate, and the bill was next sent to the House of Representatives with our amendments. There I find the bill, as printed in the House, to represent the Senate amendment to be this:

Fruits, plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation.

Instead of "fruit plants," as passed in the Senate—and I have taken the pains to hunt up the original amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, and there it is plainly written "fruit plant," with no comma after the word "fruit," and no "s," but simply "fruit plant"—it was printed in the House "Fruits, plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation and cultivation," and finally appears to have been adopted in that form. But to show that it was not intended to allow all tropical fruits to come in duty free, I may mention that in the same act there were specific duties levied upon various tropical fruits, and the old duty levied by the previous act was not changed. The act of 1870 put a specific duty of 20 per cent. on oranges and other fruits of that kind. Mr. Heyl, who is a very careful compiler of the law, when the act finally passed, treated the word "fruit" or "fruits" as a limitation of the word "plant," and in Heyl's Digest of Duties the word "fruit" is there used precisely as it was used here, as a word of limitation, and not a noun substantive, extending to a great variety of articles not contemplated by any one.

I am very sorry that this trouble occurred. It occurred in consequence of punctuation, by putting a comma after the word "fruit," which separated the two words, "fruit" and "plants"—and that was done by somebody, I do not know whom, but I think some one ought to inquire after it—and adding the letter "s," so as to make it "fruits;" then after "fruits" a comma appears; and then the clause names the other immaterial articles. This little slip of the pen, occurring somewhere in the course of engrossing or enrolling, has led to great difficulty. I find in the law published in Little & Brown's edition that the word "fruit" is there correctly printed, without the letter "s," and undoubtedly as it passed the House; so that it reads "fruit plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation and cultivation." The interposition of a comma there changes the meaning according to the literal reading; but it does seem to me that an officer construing this law, and especially if he would take the trouble to look into the course of the history of the proposition, would plainly see that the word "fruit" was used as a word of limitation—not as a word of purchase, as the lawyers say, but as a word of limitation—and not as a noun substantive containing a new item to be added to the free list. I have no doubt, on the face of the law as it now stands, that oranges, lemons, and all these different articles, are subject to 20 per cent. duty, and that that duty was not affected in the slightest degree by adding to the free list fruit-plants intended for propagation in Florida.

This is the whole history there is in the debates of Congress on this matter. As a good deal of remark has been made about this matter in the House and in the country, and some controversy has occurred as to where that letter "s" was inserted, I have felt it my duty to show to the Senate that so far as the action of the Senate is concerned the words are plain and simple and the meaning clear.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to allow me to call his attention to one thing, which may perhaps remove the ground for suspicion of intentional wrong that there would otherwise be in this case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think there was any intentional wrong.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not understand the Senator to imply that; but there has been a great deal of comment on this matter. It has been a very unfortunate thing certainly; and I confess, from what I saw about it, it seemed to me at first that there was hardly room to doubt that some intentional impropriety had occurred somewhere. I have here the original amendment, not in the handwriting of the Senator from Vermont, but in another handwriting, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the amendment seems originally to have been "plants tropical and semi-tropical," and there is no punctuation, no comma whatever, between any of these words. Afterward the word "fruit" was interlined, as any Senator will see by looking at it, and still it stood without punctuation anywhere; so that, omitting all punctuation, it reads "fruit plants tropical and semi-tropical." Had there been a hyphen between "fruit" and "plants," so as to make it a compound word, it would have been clear. Had there been a comma after "plants," so that it would have read "fruit plants,"——

Mr. SUMNER. In what stage of the bill was that?

Mr. CONKLING. That was the first amendment here which the Senator from Ohio has been adverting to, and my purpose is merely to ask the attention of the Senate to the fact that I am glad to find room here to suppose that there may have been an honest mistake rather than an intentional perversion.

The amendment stands in the bill before me without any punctuation, without a hyphen, without a comma anywhere; simply these words succeeding each other: "Fruit plants tropical or semi-tropical for the purpose of propagation." Had it been correctly written or copied, I take it it would have stood thus: "Fruit-plants," with a hyphen between, and then a comma; then followed by the definition "tropical or semi-tropical." The fact remains undoubtedly, to which the Senator has called attention, that an "s" was added here; and yet I am inclined to think that if Senators would put their eye upon this manuscript they would see even as to that that there may be an explanation without a fraud. In short, it will be observed "plants" is in the plural, so that as it stands here it would read "fruit plants," and if the person who copied it assumed that "fruit" was a substantive word and "plants" a substantive, I can see how a copyist, in order to have it symmetrical and grammatical, may have supposed that as the plural was used in one case the plural was intended to be used in the other. In other words, all I mean to do is to express my own satisfaction at finding that there is some opportunity to hope, if not to believe, that whoever made this engrossment fell into an error in place of perpetrating a fraud. It has led to very unfortunate results, and I am very glad the Senator from Ohio has told us of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will perceive that the Globe, in making up the record, has adopted the true construction undoubtedly. It reads, "Fruit plants," then a comma, "tropical and semi-tropical," &c., so that the printer has made no mistake. There it is punctuated properly.

Mr. CONKLING. That is quite right, except that even the Globe omits the compound word; there is no dash, there is no hyphen, there is nothing to connect it; but it is "fruit plants."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire merely to say that the proof copy of this bill was sent, I think, to the Committee on Finance, and it was there corrected wherever it needed correction, and, so far as the Senate copy was concerned, when printed it was correct, and of course it was correct so far as the officers of the Senate are concerned, for the bill finally had to be enrolled by the officers of the House.

Mr. CAMERON. I cannot agree exactly with the Senator from New York that there is not some degree of suspicion connected with this matter. It has not been stated here, but I believe it is a fact, that in New York only were the duties paid under protest. In all the other ports throughout the country—and there are ports at which a greater amount of fruit is imported into the country than at New York—the duties were paid without a word, they understanding the law as the Senate understood it very well; but in New York there was a protest, and nothing was paid there, and the decision of the Secretary, as I understand it, relieved them from the payment of all duties there. I remember the discussion on this subject in the Senate very well. There was some little conversation between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself on the subject of plants. It would be well for the Senate to look back at the debate at that time. Every one will remember it was only plants of which we were speaking. There was not a word said about fruits, but it was ornamental plants and flowers, and things of that sort. It was very well understood, and it excited so much attention at that time that even the transcribers must have understood it. Then there is the interposition of a comma at a place just to suit a person who wanted to make a wrong interpretation of the law; which looks very suspicious to my mind.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, this raises a question which I have for some time desired to bring to the attention of the Senate, and that is that the engrossed bills should be passed from one House to the other in print, and not in manuscript. It can be done as easily in print as in manuscript. It is so done in the British Parliament, and it is a very great security for authenticity, and against error; and if it shall occasionally compel a little delay in the transaction of our important business, there will be no harm in that.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, this is rather a serious business, for thus far it has cost the country, if I may judge from the newspapers, a million or two of dollars. Now, on the exhibition that the Senator from New York has made, it is easy to see how at least the error might have originated. I do not say that it did, but it is easy to see how it might have originated, especially if one takes into consideration an old usage, if not rule, in the construction of statutes, which was to disregard punctuation. I remember years ago being astonished to hear a very able judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, in conversation with me here in Washington, state that he never regarded punctuation in the interpretation of a statute. I take it, however, that rule will hardly be accepted in its latitude, but still it serves to explain this error.

But I should like to get something practical out of this incident, and I can make no suggestion better than to follow in the steps of my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] who, indeed, anticipated me in what I was about to say. The Congress of the United States and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts are the only two legislative bodies, I believe, now in the world that adhere to the old system of parchment in the last stage of a bill. We borrowed it from England; but the English have seen that it was not advisable to trust their statutes to a written roll, as they had done for generations; and now, at the last stage, and when the measure receives the assent of the Crown, it is always in print; and I believe I may say it is so in every legislative body of our country except Massachusetts, where the old parchment roll has prevailed, borrowed from England, precisely as it has prevailed in Congress borrowed from England. It does not prevail in France. Everything there is on paper, and if not written it is printed; and I, myself, visited their archives, especially with a view to ascertain how their records were made. I found no parchment; it was always paper. Then in England, as I have already said, very recently this whole subject was considered, and the British Parliament concluded, on the report of a very able committee, that the bills in their final stages, and when submitted to the Crown, should be in print. Now I think it would be well for Congress to follow in that channel. We followed it originally in adopting parchment; I would follow it now in adopting print.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented the petition of the members and congregation of the Williston church, of Portland, Maine, signed by the pastor, Rev. Burke F. Leavitt, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the memorial of delegates from the Indian Territory, explaining the understanding of the Indians of their treaties of 1866, and in that connection protesting against the establishment of a United States territorial government in the Indian Territory without their consent; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of citizens of Alexandria, Huntingdon County, Pennsylvania, deprecating the restoration of duties on tea and coffee, or a revival or increase of internal taxes, and praying for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Peter P. G. Hall, of Pennsylvania, late a paymaster in the Army, asking that he may be refunded money which he was obliged to pay in consequence of embezzlement by a clerk; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCOTT. I present a memorial of bankers, manufacturers, and other citizens of Philadelphia, saying that they view with alarm the propositions before Congress for increasing the volume of United States notes, and stating that they believe most earnestly that a resumption of specie payments, at the earliest practicable time, is imperatively required by the true interests of the nation, and deprecating the issue of any more legal-tender notes, and praying that the greenbacks already issued out of the so-called reserve shall be withdrawn as speedily as possible. I move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the memorial of Emerson, Stafford & Co., the memorial of the Lawrence Manufacturing Company, and the memorial of James L. Little & Co., merchants, of Boston, Massachusetts, relative to the Alabama claims; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of Arcadia W. Mastins, and the memorial of L. J. Labarbe, heir at law of Lewis Leroy, praying to be indemnified for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of William H. Hawlings and other citizens of Gloucester City, New Jersey, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present a petition from Matilda Hindman, of Arkansas, agent of the Pennsylvania Women's Suffrage Association, in which she protests at length against "a bill to aid in the execution of the laws in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes;" which was read twice and ordered to be printed. The reasons adverse to that bill, particularly as it regards the suffrage of women, are set forth at length. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer a brief petition from the Massachusetts Medical Society, duly signed by their president, George C. Shattuck, and their vice-president, Benjamin E. Cotting, and their corresponding secretary, Charles W. Swan, and their recording secretary, F. W. Draper, attested by their seal, in which they respectfully lay before Congress their opinion and conviction that the act of 1869 in respect to the Medical Corps of the Army ought to be repealed, and such an improvement made in the rank of the Medical Corps as shall assimilate their position to that of other staff officers, and secure to officers and soldiers the medical advice and attention of well-educated and skillful surgeons.

Inclosed in this are resolutions of a similar purport from the Suffolk District Medical Society, and also from the Essex North Medical Society. I move their reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of the First Presbyterian church of Pestone, Illinois, signed by the pastor, Rev. W. F. Wood, and by the elders and other officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of J. H. Tankersly, of Mount Vernon, Jefferson County, Illinois, asking for the passage of a special act of Congress allowing him compensation for loss of property during the war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of William H. Little and other citizens of Waldoborough, in the State of Maine, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present a concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Representatives, to use their efforts to secure the enactment of a law compelling all railway companies to receive and transmit to any points on their several lines all shipments without the same being compelled to pass through and pay tribute to the warehouse boards of Chicago. I was about to move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Railways, but it is suggested to me that it should go to the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board; and I therefore move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER presented the petition of citizens of Tennessee, praying an amendment to the Army appropriation bill relative to certain claims; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the petition of members and congregation of the Second Parish church of Portland, Maine, signed by the pastor, Rev. J. J. Carruthers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of the members and congregation of the Methodist Episcopal church of Pine street, Portland, Maine, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of L. H. Street and other citizens of Gloucester City, New Jersey, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of the South Second Street Methodist Episcopal church, Brooklyn, of the New York East Conference, signed by the pastor, Rev. John A. Roche, and all the officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of Matilda Barnett and her sisters, asking compensation for their property seized by the United States troops during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARVEY presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the enactment of a law to compel the Union Pacific Railroad Company to afford the same facilities for the transportation of freight and passengers in regard to rate, time, and transportation, as is contemplated by law, and without discrimination or injustice to the Kansas Pacific Railroad; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented the petition of Joseph O'Neal, Elie Wade, and other citizens of Washington County, Maryland, praying that no law may be passed transferring the claims for quartermaster stores to the claims commission; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL. I presented a memorial yesterday in relation to the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad, which was inadvertently referred to the Committee on Public Lands, when it should have been referred to the Committee on Railroads. I move that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I presented the other day the petition of Mrs. Susan Vincent, which I find was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. I intended to have it referred to the Committee on Claims. I ask that the correction be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change of reference will be made, if there be no objection.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MERRIMON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Deliah Kelly be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. WEST, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Henry A. Green be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin C. Skinner, praying for a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 518) granting a pension to Benjamin C. Skinner.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and papers of J. Milton Best, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 519) for the relief of J. Milton Best.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1402) granting a pension to John A. Fisher, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 170) for the relief of certain officers of the Navy who were dropped. furloughed, or retired, under the act of February 28, 1855, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. In this case the report made at the last session has been adopted by the committee, so that no written report is now submitted, and there is no occasion for reprinting the report of last year.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 141) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 249) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to give to George A. Armes, late captain Tenth United States Cavalry, an honorable discharge, to date from the 7th day of June, 1870, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1930), to secure to the Episcopal Board of Missions the land in the White Earth Indian reservation, in Minnesota, on which are situated their church and other buildings, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 380) to secure to the Episcopal Board of Missions the land in the White Earth Indian reservation, in Minnesota, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

REPORT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print extra copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution, have directed me to report it back with amendments, and to ask for its present consideration.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. HAMLIN, on the 13th instant:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That twelve thousand five hundred additional copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1873 be printed; twenty-five hundred of which shall be for the use of the Senate, five thousand for the use of the House, and five thousand for the use of the Institution: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages of said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty, and that there shall be no illustrations except those furnished by the Smithsonian Institution.

The Committee on Printing proposed to amend the resolution, so as to make it read:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That seven thousand five hundred additional copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1873 be printed, five hundred of which shall be for the use of the Senate, one thousand for the use of the House, and six thousand for the use of the Institution.

Mr. ANTHONY. The customary publication of this document has been twelve thousand copies; five thousand for the use of the Smithsonian Institution, twenty-five hundred for the use of the Senate, and five thousand for the use of the House of Representatives. We now have reported to increase the number to the Institution from five thousand to six thousand, to reduce the number for the Senate from twenty-five hundred to five hundred, and to reduce the number for the House from five thousand to one thousand. If the number for Congress is reduced so much, the Institution will require a little more—so the Regents think. This, I believe, is the first resolution that the Committee on Printing have reported at this session for printing any additional documents. The number is exceedingly small, and it is the intention of those who are best acquainted with the Institution, especially of those who have been charged on the part of Congress with participation in its management, that there should be some extra copies, and in deference to them we have made the recommendation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Rhode Island whether he is aware of the fact that Congress, in the early part of the session, passed a resolution suspending the publication of documents, and whether this is in harmony with the expression of Congress?

Mr. ANTHONY. That has not passed the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It passed the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator asks my judgment, I think this is not in conformity with that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should think that until the Senate reconsider that proposition we ought to adhere to it. Yesterday some proposition came from the Committee on Printing of a similar kind.

Mr. ANTHONY. What one?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Recommending the publication of some document.

Mr. ANTHONY. That was for the use of the proper Department, not for the use of Congress. It was only five hundred copies of a medical report that was thought to be valuable for scientific purposes, and they are to be distributed entirely by the Department.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think we ought not to go into retail in printing when in wholesale we have resolved not to print; and I do think it is wise to adhere to the resolution that we passed, at least until some full understanding as to the publication and distribution docuof ments is had.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think we are bound by a proposition that has only passed one House of Congress; but I am not a lawyer, and I will leave that to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think we should have a little respect for our own action, whether the House chooses to concur or not.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to state a fact. I may say in behalf of the Smithsonian Institution that I think this is entirely distinct from the documents which we publish sent to us from the Departments, or which emanate from our committees. This is purely a scientific work. It is the annual report of the Smithsonian Institution, made in pursuance of law to this body. To myself it may seem of very much less value than to many others; but I think no man can ever examine a single report of that Institution without being impressed with its great value. These reports are for the general reader perhaps of little use, being somewhat technical and scientific; but yet they are of immense value to the world, and they are transmitted all over the world, and we receive back in exchange the scientific reports of different societies and different governments. I think this stands entirely distinct from the documents ordinarily printed by Congress; and I do not think the law or resolution to which my colleague refers ought to apply to this report, if it does technically; and if it does, this has got to pass the ordeal of the House, and it must be by a concurrent vote, which will express their opinion that this stands distinct from other matters, as well as our own. I hope the resolution will be concurred in.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Only one word. Early in this session we determined to arrest the publication of public documents, and I think properly. I am not going to say whether it is true or not, for on that I have my own opinions, and they may not be in harmony with the public sense on that subject; but one thing is clear, that from one consideration or another, within the last few years, a very general impression or sentiment or conviction has come to obtain in the public mind that the publication of documents by the Congress of the United States had become a very great abuse. It took a variety of forms. It was an abuse under the franking privilege, which overloaded the mails. It was an expense in many ways, and it was a corruption in itself. That is a deep seated and thorough conviction in the public mind, right or wrong, and I think the Senate of the United States was wise when at the beginning of this session it said it would pause in the publication and distribution of documents, for the present at least, until some wise determination could be come at.

Now, it may be that the views of my colleague render this an exceptional case; and it is a proper thing, possibly, to publish the reports of the Smithsonian Institution, being of a scientific character, so far as relates to itself; but this resolution provides for their publication for distribution, and certainly it ought not to apply to that. We do not want these reports for distribution. We have no means of distributing them. At any rate, to that extent I submit to my colleague that this is certainly within the inhibition of the resolution of the Senate. If there is no special objection, therefore, I should like to have this resolution lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to say a word on this subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I withdraw the motion to allow the Senator to do so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have only a word to say. I shall vote for the resolution to print this report; and I will vote for any resolution to print the proceedings of Congress. I think this idea of isolating the Congress of the United States from the people is a very foolish one. As to economy, I think it is an illustration of that wise saying that "there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty." The people of my State write to me every day for copies of the Agricultural Report, which contains most valuable information to the farmers of the country, and they cannot be obtained. The books are ready to be printed, but their printing is stopped; and we are keeping the proceedings of Congress here as a close corporation from the people. I introduced a bill providing that these public documents should be circulated; the postage in no event to be more than twenty-five cents a volume, and not requiring prepayment, and authorizing the documents to be sold if they were not called for within ten days. That bill has not been reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will say to the Senator that the committee have it under consideration.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope Congress will adopt some measure by which that which transpires here may be circulated and disseminated among the people. At a large expense we print every day a record of the proceedings of Congress. What good does it do? The people do not get it. No provision is made for its circulation.

Now, as to the idea that the people are opposed to this, I was very much struck by a remark which was made—I do not know but that it was in one of the articles which were read here yesterday—that a million of people might petition Congress, but we must remember there are thirty-nine millions that are not heard from. I believe the people want information as to what transpires here, and it is their right to have it, and it is our duty to give them the opportunity to know what we do.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe when this report was presented the usual number was ordered to be printed. If not, I will make that motion. That number ought to be printed at any rate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was so ordered. The Chair understands objection to be made to the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

IMPORTATION OF FRUIT-PLANTS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to say a word in regard to the matter which was brought to our notice this morning by the Senator from Ohio. I find on reference to the enrolled bill that the mistake in putting a comma after "fruit," was made in the Senate. I wish to state this in justice to all parties. There is a comma placed after "fruit" in the engrossed copy of the Senate amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it in the singular or plural?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Singular, and I have no question that it is an honest comma. It is made with the same pen and ink that all the other commas appear to have been made with, and it was an honest mistake.

Mr. WEST. As this subject has been opened again, it enables me to say to the Senate that I dissent from the proposition that this error, whether intentional or unintentional, has cost the country $2,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said half a million.

Mr. WEST. It has not cost the country a cent. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to say that it had cost the country about two millions.

Mr. SUMNER. By "the country" I meant the revenue.

Mr. WEST. The fact is, Mr. President, that the Treasury of the United States has simply collected $2,000,000 less from the people, and the people have saved $2,000,000 by the error.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Half a million.

Mr. WEST. Well, whatever the amount is; it has not cost the country a cent.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LOGAN. Yesterday morning a petition was presented by the chairman of the Committee on Finance from the city of Chicago, in reference to the contraction of the United States legal-tender notes. In answer to that I said that I had noticed in the papers some of the names that were attached to that petition, and they were persons who had closed their banks and paid off their depositors by paper that they held. I stated the fact that I had noticed the names in different newspapers of bankers in Chicago who were making this request, and supposing the petition contained the names of those mentioned in the newspapers, I made the remark. Desiring not to do injustice to any one, I went this morning to the room of the Committee on Finance and examined the petition carefully. I find that the names of the bankers that I had noticed published in the newspapers, and to which I had reference, are left off the petition, or at least they are not attached to it. They either did not sign the petition, or they were represented in the newspapers as having signed it when they had not done so. I make this statement for the purpose of correcting the statement I made, so that no injustice may be done to any one. On examining the petition I find the signers to be, as the presumption is, respectable gentlemen, and gentlemen that I would not make any such remarks in regard to. The names that I referred to are not there at all.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 520) authorizing the Second National Bank of Lansing, Michigan, to change its name; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and put on its passage now a joint resolution releasing the members of the Fitz John Porter court-martial from the obligation of their oaths to not disclose the vote or opinion of any particular member of said court. In the first place I will ask that it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the introduction of the joint resolution?

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. I object.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I give notice that I will present it and call it up to-morrow.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 521) for the relief of the heirs of Henry Fulenweider, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WINDOM (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 522) for the relief of Nathaniel P. Harben, of Whitefield County, Georgia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 523) to remove the disabilities of Thomas M. Jones, of Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPRAGUE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 524) to protect timber lands of the United States Government reservations and lands purchased for the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to state that this bill emanates from the district attorney at Louisville, Kentucky, was received by the United States Attorney-General, and forwarded to me. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 525) for the relief of Peter P. G. Hall, a paymaster of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 526) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend an act approved May 31, 1870, entitled 'An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of the Union, and for other purposes,'" approved February 28, 1871, and the acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, and the act of which said act is amendatory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will withhold that motion until later in the day. I think the pending bill ought to be out of the way.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. We can get that out of the way beyond all question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall have to enter a motion to reconsider if this is agreed to now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland withdraw his motion?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLING OF BILLS.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the following resolution for adoption:

Resolved, That the Committee on Enrolled Bills be instructed to consider the expediency of superseding the present system of enrolling bills by writing on parchment, and providing that the same when submitted to the President shall be printed and so preserved in the Department of State.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it should be considered by the committee that as, under our system of limited sessions, at a given moment on the 4th of March of every alternate year Congress abruptly terminates, a large amount of the business perfected by Congress during the last three or four days of a session under this resolution would be lost. Sometimes the most important appropriation bills are not passed until the very last night of the session. There is scarcely an opportunity to enable them to be engrossed and enrolled under the present system. And if bills like those and the many hundreds of bills which are considered in the last hours of the session under our system are required to go to the printing office to be printed and returned, with the delays which that will cause, very much of the legislation which we perfect will be lost.

I do not say that this is an absolute objection, but the committee in considering this resolution must provide that there shall be no bill passed by Congress within two days of the close of the session, or within such reasonable time as will allow the mass of bills to be printed. If this proposition becomes a law, as it must in order to be binding, because a mere resolution of the Senate will not reach the matter, or a mere resolution of the House——

Mr. SUMNER. A joint rule of the two Houses probably will.

Mr. SARGENT. If it becomes a law or a joint rule of the two Houses, it cannot be set aside for the convenience or by the consent of a single body; and the result will be, unless it goes farther and provides for limiting legislation within two days of the close of the session, it will become so operative that much of our legislation will be lost. I do not say that I am opposed to this method of enrolling bills; but I do say that coupled with it there must be some provision by which legislation shall cease for the last two days of the session.

Mr. SUMNER. The objection of my friend goes simply to the last two or three days of the session. It does not go against the proposition itself. I think that a committee taking this matter in charge would very easily arrange to meet the difficulty mentioned by the Senator.

Mr. SARGENT. I only wished to call their attention to that difficulty.

Mr. SUMNER. I cannot think that the difficulty which the Senator has stated so strongly can be a source of any real trouble. I believe it can be met. How is it met in other legislative bodies? How is it met in our State Legislatures? How is it met in the British Parliament, which, on the last day of the session, is crowded precisely as we are? There everything is printed, or if it is not printed, there is some provision for such an incident; but I feel sure that everything is printed, and I do not doubt that it can be with us. But whether it can be on the last day of the session, or the last two days of the session, let the committee consider. As my friend from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] suggests, we might have a small printing establishment here at the Capitol expressly for service during the last night of the session. It would not cost so much as we now pay for parchment and enrolling clerks.

Mr. ANTHONY. It seems to me the difficulty which my friend from California suggests might be obviated by applying to this rule—which will be a joint rule I suppose, not a law of Congress—the same provision that we have with regard to the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules, that a motion to suspend them shall always be in order, and be immediately considered and decided without debate. But it would be a very great advantage if, after all the business of the Congress was completed, we were obliged to remain here two days without liberty to initiate any new business, but only to perfect that which had been transacted, and to prevent such errors as have been exposed to-day.

Mr. SARGENT. That I believe to be the practical reform to be brought about; and if that could be coupled with this, I believe it would be a great advantage.

Mr. ANTHONY. This resolution, I understand, is only one of inquiry.

Mr. SUMNER. One of inquiry. I hope, however, it will end in something.

Mr. STOCKTON. One moment——

Mr. SHERMAN. If this is going to give rise to debate I must call for the regular order.

Mr. STOCKTON. I do not desire to consume time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator oppose the resolution?

Mr. STOCKTON. No; I am not going to oppose it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. STOCKTON. I do not rise to oppose the resolution, because it is simply a resolution of inquiry and is very proper; but I rise to make a suggestion. The Senator from Massachusetts, speaking of the course in the State Legislatures, I think made a mistake in reference at least to some. The bills are printed, as they are printed here, in the Legislatures, but in some States at least the bills passed, when enrolled, are enrolled in manuscript, and are signed by the governors of the States in manuscript, and the evidence of those laws is an exemplified copy taken from the manuscript which is filed in the office of the secretary of state. That I know to be true in reference to some States.

The difficulty which occurred to my mind, and which I simply rose to suggest, that the committee might consider it with the other suggestions which have been made, is that bills are amended just before they pass; and, perhaps, in the last moments, a bill which is very imperfect, which could not possibly receive the assent of the Senate, by an amendment put in, is changed and passed. Before the Senate adjourns there is not time to have that amendment printed. It may be agreed to at the last moment. Therefore, the committee should consider how amendments in such cases are to be printed. Bills before State Legislatures are often put through in an amended form, so that the engrossing clerk can hardly make out from the alterations and the amendments made what it is that he is to engross; and then they go to the committee on engrossed bills, and are reported as correctly engrossed before the governor signs them. Therefore, it becomes absolutely necessary that legislation should stop and that time should elapse in order that the amendments may be properly enrolled, and if printed the printer should have time to do it. I simply rose to make this suggestion to the committee in considering the proposition, which is right in itself, that they may see if they cannot avoid this difficulty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 780) requiring the United States marshals and clerks of the United States circuit and district courts who have received fees and emoluments in excess of their legal compensation to deposit the same with the Treasurer of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 2084) to provide for the appointment of clerks for the circuit and district courts of the United States held at New Albany and Evansville, in the district of Indiana; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1273) to regulate proceedings in mandamus.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 493) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Arkansas.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 438) to withhold from sale the site of the old Nyatt Point light-house;

A bill (S. No. 269) to change the titles of certain naval officers, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1906) to dredge and protect the navigable channel at the mouth of Buffalo River against the sand-bar formed by the gale of December, 1873.

ILLICIT DISTILLERIES SUPPRESSED.

Mr. FLANAGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate the number of illicit distilleries that have been suppressed by the officers of the Government in the last six months, and the daily capacity for production, with the locality of the same.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," the pending question being on the motion of Mr. MERRIMON to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday adopted the amendment of Mr. COOPER to the instructions proposed by Mr. MERRIMON as an amendment to the motion of Mr. BUCKINGHAM to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Was not the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina? I thought it was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was a substitute, the Chair understood.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to make a suggestion that possibly may lead to the termination of this debate. We have had several votes on the question of instructions and they have all been voted down but one, and that is again pending on a motion to reconsider. Is it not probable, after all the debate we have had, that the Senate will refuse to give any instructions whatever, so that we shall go on voting down one character of instructions after another? Is it not better first to try the question whether there shall be any instructions, and if that shall be decided in the affirmative, then we can go on as to the character of the instructions. I confess that for my own part I would prefer to see the bill recommitted without instructions. This debate has developed a great variety of opinions upon the most important points, and the Senate is so equally divided that instructions would have very little value, because the majority that may vote any special instructions would doubtless be divided somewhat as to the details of the bill which the committee might bring in in accordance therewith. I do not wish to see a bill upon this subject pass by a majority of two or three in this body. I do not wish to see a bill passed that shall not meet the pretty general sense of the Senate. Holding, as I do, very decidedly to the opinions that I have expressed, I cannot be positive when men of such ability and such information as those who are upon the other side differ with me; and perhaps I would not adhere to them at all were they not enforced with equal ability and equal information by those who do agree with me. But I hope that the Committee on Finance may be able to draw up a bill that will meet, if not the general assent, at least the opinion of the great body of the Senate that it is as good a bill as can be adopted; and in order to vote for such a bill I would go a great way, I would be willing to give up a great deal. I should not want to have a bill passed here on this subject that went entirely against the views of my friend from Indiana, who has illustrated this subject with so much ability and with so much information, but I should like to have a bill on which the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Ohio would substantially agree, and also the Senator from Vermont, as about the best bill that we could get through the Senate for the benefit of the country.

Now, let us in the first place see if we mean to have any instructions at all, and if that is so voted we can decide as to the character of the instructions. If, therefore, the Senator from North Carolina will withdraw the motion now pending, and allow the vote to be taken upon recommitting the bill without instructions, we shall be able to decide whether there is any use in carrying on this debate further.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I wish to suggest, in connection with that, to the Senator from Rhode Island that the Senate has not expressed itself by vote upon the question of increase; and that is simply what is proposed to the Senate by the original motion of the Senator from North Carolina. If the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island should be adopted by the Senator from Tennessee, and should extend to a test of the question whether there shall be an increase upon the proposition submitted by the Senator from North Carolina, then when the Senate shall have expressed itself upon that question it would seem fair to all the interests represented here, as revealed by the expressions of Senators, to submit the general proposition that the committee should not be instructed; but until the Senate has expressed itself on the simple question of the increase of the currency, it would seem hardly fair, to a moiety at least, if not a majority, of the Senate who appear to be in favor of some increase, to get rid of all instructions. In illustration of that, I would state that I have heard from different Senators that they voted against free banking lest proper restrictions might not be put on, and those same Senators are in favor of an increase of the currency. Now, I ask the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Tennessee to allow the Senate to take a vote on the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, and then we shall have all the phases of the proposition presented to the judgment of the Senate, so that the committee, if the matter is sent back to them without instructions, will at least have received the judgment of the Senate upon all these features.

Mr. MORTON. I beg leave to suggest to my friend from Rhode Island that as the matter stands now the committee is instructed. There is, however, a motion pending to reconsider.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator is correct; and in accordance with the suggestion I made that vote should be reconsidered. I desire the bill to be sent to the committee without any instructions whatever.

Mr. MORTON. The first thing will be the reconsideration.

Mr. BOREMAN. The last vote taken yesterday evening, as I understand, was upon the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr COOPER] to instruct the Committee on Finance to report a bill providing for the convertibility of United States Treasury notes into gold coin or 5 per cent. bonds of the United States, and also for free banking under the provisions of the national-bank act. That is a proposition to incorporate into one bill free banking and the convertibility of United States notes without their distribution; simply the proposition which has been heretofore reported by the Committee on Finance, as I understand. It seems to me that it is hardly worth while to go through the form of instructing that committee to report a bill which they have already reported for our action. We might as well take up that bill and pass it.

But, sir, this proposition, I apprehend, was offered for the purpose of defeating the other one which lies behind it; that is, the increase of banking circulation; and the friends of that increase ought now to see that if this motion to reconsider does not prevail, there is the end, as settled by the vote of the Senate, of any increase of circulation. It would be regarded as decisive after the vote that was taken here yesterday.

My opinion is that the people of this country and the business interests of this country demand that there shall be some increase in the circulating medium of the country. It is believed to be necessary for the business of the country and for its fair transaction, and it seems to me that it is reasonable. Some time since, in 1870 I believe, we increased the banking circulation $54,000,000. It has now been nearly four years since that was authorized, and we have seen no disastrous effects from it. It has been taken up gradually, and is not entirely exhausted yet, as I believe. The country has not been damaged by it; on the contrary, I think prosperity attended the business of the country until the recent panic, which I presume no one attributes to the law passed in 1870.

While it is an increase of banking circulation, yet it does not increase that thing which is to be used in the redemption of the banking circulation. We do not, by the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON] increase that which is to redeem the banking circulation. We merely afford the people of this country extended facilities for the transaction of their business. The greenback circulation—the United States notes—remains at what it is at present; it is not inflated. The means of redemption remains as it is. Free banking has been in existence in many States of this Union for years past, and according to the views of some gentlemen here who are opposing all sorts of inflation no damage has resulted to these States by having a system of free banking, where everybody could bank who complied with the rules and regulations of their laws.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that the friends of an increase of currency ought to regard this as a test vote. The question yesterday, I apprehend, could not have been regarded as a test. The proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] was one to throw the doors wide open; there was no limit. But here we have a proposition lying behind this, to be voted on if this motion to reconsider prevails, which limits the increase of banking circulation, and which it seems to me, after a good deal of consideration, may be better than that of the Senator from Pennsylvania. That might have been attended with damage to the interests of the business of the country. The persons who are opposed to an increase of circulation might have been alarmed; it might have affected the business of the country to a damaging extent. But if we pass the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina, they know then precisely what can be done under the law. It is not unlimited; bounds are set to it. You can go to the extent of $46,000,000 of additional paper currency; but you can go no further. That is needed, in my judgment; and I trust that the friends of an increase of circulation will see to it now that this vote is reconsidered, and that we get back to that proposition where we can have a test vote, and then let it rest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee was adopted.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I beg the indulgence of the Senate for a short while this morning. It was not my purpose to add a single word to this debate; but the discussion has taken such a wide range, and so many propositions have been brought forward—and some of them voted upon—that I deem it due to myself and perhaps to others, if not to the proposition now pending, of which I am the author, to add something to what I have already said.

I felt constrained to vote against the proposition of the venerable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] and likewise that of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] and also, for the same reasons, against the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER.]

In order to make myself understood, it is necessary that I should advert at the outset to some facts and principles with which the Senate are familiar, and to restate the position that I occupy in reference to the general subject of the currency before the Senate.

We have been correctly told that money is a medium of exchange; in its true sense it implies only a medium of exchange. Its purpose is to effect exchanges; and that is its only legitimate purpose. By the common consent of mankind, when any country is in a normal state, the purest, truest medium of exchange is gold and silver of a fixed fineness. The purpose of money being only to effect exchanges, the quantity of it necessary to answer the purposes of the country is exactly so much as is necessary to make such exchanges, and no more. If, on the one hand, a country has more than is necessary for that purpose, then there is redundancy, a useless and a worse than useless quantity in the country; and the result is an unnatural stimulus to industry and enterprise, and the people engage in reckless extravagance and in speculative adventures, which result in panics and monetary evils of all sorts throughout the land. On the other hand, if there is not a sufficient quantity of money to make such exchanges in an orderly and legitimate way, then the country is afflicted with what is called contraction; and industry, enterprise, and commerce languish.

It is, therefore, a matter of the highest moment to ascertain exactly what volume of currency is necessary to make the exchanges of the country. Experience shows that it is impossible to ascertain exactly what the volume ought to be; and, indeed, the circumstances of a country make it greater at one time than another; and therefore it is that statesmen and business men in determining this question can only approximate to the true standard.

As I have said, a country in its normal state has for its medium of exchange gold and silver, and only these; not by virtue simply of a statute or any constitutional provision, but by virtue of the universal laws of commerce that no country can deny or put aside but at the expense of its best economical interests.

The constitutional currency of this country is gold and silver. It is written in effect in our Constitution that that shall be the medium of measuring our exchanges, and up to the breaking out of the late war that was the currency we had the benefit of, and in that we were upon a common level with all the nations of the civilized world.

By reason of the exigencies of the war, that system of currency was put aside and a new one adopted; an abnormal one, growing out of the disordered condition of the country and the suddenly increased wants of the Government. In lieu of the gold and silver medium, the country adopted a purely credit system of money to make its exchanges. That system consists of what are commonly called "greenbacks," and also national-bank currency. It is a purely credit currency, and this is the poorest currency known in this or any other country; not because it is mean, as some have said; not because it is false, as some have said; but in its very nature it is less valuable, it is less uniform, it answers the purpose for which it is intended less successfully; it is more changeable than any other currency that is known in the business world. This appears from the uniform experience of all civilized nations.

By reason of the exigencies of the late war, a purely credit currency and the inflation that necessarily grew out of the condition of the country during the war, we realized a serious evil that has beset the country ever since that time; the country has had none other than this credit currency.

What effect did it produce? Depreciation in value, uncertainty in the standard of value, an unnatural stimulation of enterprise in some localities, hazardous speculation, luxurious living; not only speculation in real things, but speculation in imaginary things—stock-jobbing, trading in fancy stocks, and imaginary things that had no existence whatever. All sorts of extravagances have been practiced, and continue in some measure to this day. Unnatural, improper, illegitimate enterprises have swelled the volume of business of the country, and the result has been what might have been anticipated by our observing statesmen—money panics, frequent stringency in the money market, and sometimes universal distress, verging upon absolute destruction, as in case of the panic of September last, not yet entirely passed away.

Our statesmen seeing all this, and honestly and patrotically desiring to better the condition of the country, undertook—I think not in the wisest manner—to control this matter and to get the country back to a legitimate system of exchanges. In doing this, there was wonderful and systematic contraction. Notwithstanding the vastly increased volume of business, stimulated by this very species of currency, the multiplied industries, and the increase of our population and enterprise, this contraction went on until the whole volume, consisting, first, of greenback currency—the legal-tender notes as they are called; secondly, the national-bank currency; thirdly, the fractional currency, was reduced to $760,000,000, and the whole of it purely credit in its character, it being entirely inconvertible and resting alone on the faith of the country.

The practical question now before the Senate is, is that volume of currency sufficient to make in an orderly and legitimate way the business exchanges of this country? If so, then we have money enough; if not, we have not enough; and the Senate are divided solely upon that question.

In my judgment that volume is not sufficient. In the first place, at least $200,000,000 of that volume of currency is unemployed. Under our national-banking laws at least 30 per cent. of the amount of banking capital is kept locked up in the banks for the purpose of redeeming the notes of the banks of issue and for the purpose of paying their deposits. In the next place, there is a large amount of this greenback currency that is hoarded. There are other considerable amounts that are in transitu, and there are other ways that might be suggested in which large amounts of it are unemployed. I think therefore it is safe to say that at least $200,000,000 of the present volume of currency in the country is not in circulation; so that the gross volume of currency in the country in circulation is less than $600,000,000, and it is safe to say it does not exceed that amount.

Mr. SCHURZ. If I may interrupt the Senator from North Carolina, he says that a very large amount of our currency is hoarded, and is therefore not in circulation; it is withdrawn from the active pursuits of business. Can he tell us why it is hoarded; why it is not used to effect the necessary transactions of business in the country?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will answer the question, and I think successfully, and in order to make the answer I will resort to my own observation. In my State I could mention the names of half a dozen planters who annually put by from one to five thousand dollars. Credit is uncertain; they have no ready means of investment; they are not acquainted with the business world; they are afraid even of the national bonds; and when they get this money, instead of investing it, as they might do, or employing it in some enterprise, they put it in their chests, lock it up, where it remains indefinitely, and until some happy bargain shall present itself, when they buy a piece of land or some article of property which they think will be valuable to them.

Mr. SCHURZ. Does the Senator think there are a great many persons in the United States who hoard money simply because they do not know how to invest it?

Mr. MERRIMON. I have no doubt of it in many sections.

Mr. SCHURZ. I must confess that, according to my observation, the number of such people is exceedingly small. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. ROBERTSON] suggests to me that those who know how to make money generally know also how to invest it. But there is a probability that a good many of them keep back their money because they have not any confidence in the present status of business.

Mr. MERRIMON. I have no doubt about the correctness of my suggestion. Business is so uncertain, faith is so ill kept, they prefer, in thousands of instances, to hold what they have. I only suggested that, however, as one means by which a very considerable amount of the currency of the country was kept out of circulation. I say—and I believe that the facts sustain me—that the actual amount of paper money in circulation in this country now does not exceed $600,000,000. And, in my judgment, the volume of currency in circulation is not sufficiently great to answer the legitimate wants of the country, and therefore it is that I am in favor of what I conceive to be a reasonable increase of it in order to meet this legitimate demand. It is possible that I err; I do not think I do. If I do I am sure I do so honestly. I have no desire or motive to do otherwise than consult the general good.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but as he is discussing a general point, I think it appropriate to put a question right here. He assumes that there is not national currency enough in the country to effect the legitimate exchanges of business. May I ask him what evidence he has of that fact?

Mr. MERRIMON. I am going to state it now. That is the next matter in the order of what I wish to say. Without going into a detailed discussion of the various points that I am going to suggest—and I am going to suggest them in a very summary way, and there are others that I will not take time even to suggest—I arrive at this conclusion by a consideration of the volume of the currency, and which was specie currency, that this country had anterior to the late war; and when I consider that; when I consider the effect of the bloated currency that the exigencies of the war forced upon the country; when I consider the increase of exchanges growing out of the war and the enterprise stimulated by it; when I consider the increase of our population; when I consider the amount of money that has been in circulation from time to time since the close of the war; when I consider the panics that have been produced by the contraction in the currency which has taken place within the last eight years; when I consider that the Eastern States have an excess of the quantity of the currency to which they are entitled under the currency law of the United States of over $80,000,000; when I consider that they have not there now more than they need, as their bankers and business men say; when I consider that the whole West is without a sufficient amount of money, and is not only without it now but has been without it, so that the industrial population there have had to pay from 1 to 1½ and 2 per cent. a month for interest; when I consider the wants of the South, and particularly of my own State, of which I am personally cognizant; when I consider the circulation per capita in that great commercial country, England, and that other great commercial country, France, and compare the circulation there with the circulation per capita of this country; when I consider other facts and circumstances, to which I have not time now to advert, I am constrained to come to the conclusion that the volume of currency in this country is not sufficient to make easily the exchanges that the legitimate demands of business require. My judgment is that the volume ought to be increased to such an extent as that the maximum circulation of greenbacks should be $400,000,000—the maximum circulation of national-bank currency should be $400,000,000, and the gross volume of currency, including the $50,000,000 of fractional currency, should be $850,000,000. Then assuming that $200,000,000 of that sum would not be in active operation, we would have in active circulation $650,000,000. I do not believe that is too great a sum, and therefore it is that I offered the substitute for the bill reported by the Finance Committee, to increase the bank circulation $46,000,000.

I desired to say at the time, but I would not trouble the Senate to say it, that I did not offer the substitute for an increase of bank currency because I preferred that species of currency. I said on a former occasion that I was opposed to the present national banking system of the country; and I gave some reasons why I opposed it. I am especially opposed to that feature of it which implies, and practically operates, as a monopoly in the business of banking; but knowing that the national currency law has been in existence since the close of the war, that the business men of the country, the bankers of the country, the legal profession and the judges of the country, understand it, and it has been expounded and judicially settled in many respects, and believing that as my proposition will not derange the business of the country, will not create a new law to be tried, to be investigated, to be subjected to judicial determination, and desiring to put forward a plain proposition that the whole country could understand, one so plain that the simplest mind could comprehend it. I thought it best under the circumstances, as a present measure of relief to the country, that the bank currency should be increased $46,000,000, which would make the gross volume of that currency in the country $400,000,000. These are the considerations that prompted me to adopt this course rather than another; that would be attended with more or less complication, and I did it the more readily because the difference in point of value between the greenback currency and the national-bank currency is nominal.

I said a moment ago that I proposed this measure as a measure of present relief, because I believe that the wants of the country demand this much increase, and only for that purpose. That done, I insist that this Congress at the present session shall go on and do what ought to have been done immediately after the close of the war, devise and establish a new monetary system for the country based upon gold and silver, to go into operation gradually and absolutely on a day certain in the future, making that day as near as may be to the present time, having due regard to the necessities and circumstances of the country and its business. I want the time between now and the day when this suggested new system shall go into operation and specie payments shall prevail in this country again, to be sufficiently long to allow the business of the country to adapt itself to it.

Sir, I am as warmly and as strongly in favor of a specie basis for the finances of this country as any gentleman present; but I must take into consideration the circumstances of the country, and I think we ought to devise such a plan as will enable us to get back to it without materially interfering with the material prosperity of the country, and in such a way as to disturb the business relations of the country as little as possible. This cannot be done immediately or suddenly.

Now, let me state briefly my position. It is, first, that we grant the simple relief that the country needs and demands now, and has peremptorily demanded for the last six or eight months, by increasing the bank circulation for the South and West, under existing laws which are settled, $46,000,000, so as to make the gross volume of bank circulation $400,000,000. Having passed that simple measure, then let us go to work, cautiously consulting every authority and every interest, and devise a monetary system for the country based upon gold and silver, to go into operation on the 4th of July, 1876, or some other day farther off than that, as the wisdom of Congress may designate.

That is the position I occupy. I want some increase of circulation. I do not want inflation. I deny that I desire inflation. I deny the effect of my action is to produce inflation. It is only to increase the circulation to that lawful extent that the interests of the country demand. The difficulty, and that is the sole practical difficulty we have, is to ascertain what that reasonable volume is. We find, on the one hand, the creditor classes of the country saying it is too great now. How natural that is! A man who has got money to lend wants to make money as scarce as possible, so that he can get the highest rate of interest for his; and he is the man who, to use a common phrase, wants "dear money." On the other hand, there is another class who are always wanting to borrow money, who use it for a multiplicity of purposes, and they are the class who want what is popularly called "cheap money." They not only want the legitimate demands of the country supplied, but they want the currency inflated, to the end that they may get it cheap—they are those who cry "cheap money!" My judgment is that Congress ought not to yield to the clamor of either of these classes. We ought not to yield to the demand of those who say we must make money dear by contraction; we ought not to yield to the clamor of those who want to borrow money, who want "cheap money," because they are the larger class. Our action ought to be judicious and conservative. We ought to ascertain, as nearly as we can, what volume of currency is required by the best interests of the country, and to provide for it.

Various propositions have been offered as a substitute for the pending one offered by myself, and many efforts have been made, as it seems to me—and I say so with all proper respect—to avoid ascertaining the deliberate judgment of the Senate as to whether there shall be an increase of currency or not. On the one hand, the contractionists—I use that word in no offensive sense—insist that so far from having too little money, we have too much; and on the other hand there is another class, who say we have not enough; that we ought to have $1,000,000,000; we ought to have $1,200,000,000! I do not go with either side. I want to ascertain, I repeat, the volume which the best interests of the country demand, and to grant that, and to grant no more. I have indicated the amount I think necessary; for that I will vote; I cannot vote for less; I do not think it wise to vote for more.

Propositions have been offered here avowedly to get rid of the monopoly feature in the national-banking law, and they are called propositions to establish "free banking." With all respect to the honorable gentlemen who have offered these various measures, I undertake to say that no one to establish free banking has been presented during this discussion. I undertake to say, whether you take the proposition of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] the proposition of the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] or the proposition of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER,] each one of these propositions, while it involves a limitation that retains the monopoly feature of the present banking system, provides, if we take one view, for an amount of inflation (and I use that term in no offensive sense) that would prove disastrous to the best interests of the country, or, if we take another view, will produce a contraction of the currency which cannot be tolerated but at the hazard of general disaster. Now, let us see if I am correct in these positions.

Mr. GORDON. I should like the Senator from North Carolina to show how the plan proposed by me looks to contraction.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is exactly what I am going to proceed to show the honorable Senator and the Senate.

The first proposition was made by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] He proposed to strike out of the existing currency law that provision which limited the volume of bank circulation. That was the sole effect of his proposition. That would enable the authorities of the Government to allow the creation of national banks, according to the existing banking law, with a limitation that happens in this wise; and I beg to call attention to it, for it is material to understand it in order to see the force of what I am going to say.

The present banking law requires that every national bank in certain cities shall keep on deposit in its vaults a reserve fund in greenbacks of 25 per cent. of its circulation and 25 per cent. of its deposits. All other banks are required to keep on deposit in their vaults 15 per cent. of their circulation and 15 per cent. of their deposits. This reserve is to be kept there perpetually for the purpose of redeeming their notes when they shall be required to do it, and for the purpose of paying their depositors. The volume of greenbacks is $356,000,000. The authorities of the Government, if the amendment of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania had prevailed, could have gone on and increased the number of national banks in the country until this whole volume of greenbacks would have been exhausted for the purpose of reserves. How much would that have allowed? The greatest volume of greenbacks, including the reserve in the Treasury, is $400,000,000. It was said here but the other day—and I concur in the statement—that the average of greenback currency which is required upon an average to be kept in bank to redeem this currency and to pay its deposits is 33 per cent.; so that you might issue three dollars of bank currency for one dollar in greenbacks. What volume of currency then would $400,000,000 of greenbacks as a reserve allow to go out as bank currency in the whole country? Just $1,200,000,000. That is the effect of it, if you take the first view suggested, and use the greenbacks only as reserve to secure bank currency.

Now let us take the other view. Suppose one half of the reserve kept in the banks should be devoted to the redemption of the banks' own currency and the other half should be retained for the purpose of paying the deposits, then what will the whole volume of bank currency be? Manifestly, $600,000,000. If you take one view of this banking law and the free-banking proposition that the gentlemen have endeavored to get the Senate to adopt, it would increase the circulation to twelve hundred millions, and if you take another view it contracts it until the volume of currency in the country will only be six hundred millions. If we had twelve hundred millions of this national currency turned loose on the country, for a little while business would flourish, but enterprise, stock-gambling, speculation, and luxurious living would increase until that currency would become a stench in the nostrils of the people. It would produce, in my judgment, universal ruin, and would not only ruin the country, but it would ingulf those gentlemen who imposed it upon the country. On the other hand, if the other view should be taken, it would produce contraction that would reduce the volume of circulation in this country to six hundred millions, and thus cripple all industrial interests. These would be the probable effects of the plan proposed by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania.

Now, sir, what is the plan of the Senator from Georgia? It is the very same plan except he proposes that the committee shall report a bill "providing for the convertibility of the United States Treasury notes into low-interest bonds or gold coin, at the option of the Government, and the bonds convertible into United States Treasury notes at the option of the holder." That is free banking just as was provided by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, except that it adds this, that the greenbacks may be converted into a bond bearing a low rate of interest. That is the sole distinction between the two.

Mr. GORDON. What does the Senator from North Carolina think of the last clause of that provision?

Mr. MERRIMON. "Convertible into United States Treasury notes at the option of the holder?"

Mr. GORDON. Does not that mean something?

Mr. MERRIMON. It does; but it does not increase the volume of greenbacks; it does not reduce the volume of greenbacks. I cannot so understand it. I have looked at it with great care. I repeat, the sole distinction between the gentleman's proposition and the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania is that his provides that the greenback currency of the country may be converted into a bond bearing a low rate of interest.

Then take next the proposition of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER.] What does he propose? He proposes "free banking," as he calls it, upon the very same principle as does the Senator from Pennsylvania, and then his other proposition is in substance the same as that of the Senator from Georgia. What is that? It is to make greenbacks convertible into gold, or into a Government bond bearing a low rate of interest. That is the effect of his proposition.

The only difference, therefore, in all these propositions that have been submitted, and upon which the Senate has voted, consists in the fact that that of the Senator from Georgia and that of the Senator from Tennessee provide for converting the greenbacks into gold or into a Government bond bearing a small rate of interest; and the effect of adopting any one of those measures would be to increase the bank circulation; if the speculators of the country should so desire, if you take one view, to twelve hundred millions, or to contract it, if another view is taken, to six hundred millions. And here I wish the Senate to keep in view that there is in these "free-banking" propositions, so called, that same feature of monopoly, except that it is in one view enlarged a little, in another view contracted a little, which exists in the present banking law. It is limited by the volume of greenbacks, and in the way and manner that I have described.

But it is said that the Government is responsible for this money. What good does that do when you have a redundancy and the Government does not pay gold? Such a volume could not be properly employed; it could not go into foreign countries like specie; it would die and become an intolerable nuisance; it would cease to make exchanges at all, and having had the effect to drive gold and silver out of the country, it would leave the country without money, prostrate and ruined pecuniarily, and there would be universal bankruptcy. All experience proves the truth of this statement, and I will not be a party in bringing upon my country such evils if I know it. To increase the volume of our currency as these gentlemen propose—to throw out so vast a volume of purely credit currency—is to legislate redundancy and ruin into the country, and this will appear most manifest when we make proper note of the volume of exchanges.

But one gentleman has said that there is not capital in the country to organize these national banks, so as to throw out this vast circulation that I say would be the natural consequence of the proposed system—that there is not money enough in the country to do it; they could not buy the national bonds. There is a great fallacy in that, and let me show it, and I think I can do it successfully; and it is well to look into this matter, for it is one of great practical moment. Here, for illustration, is a person who has $500,000 in greenbacks, and he wants to engage in the business of banking. He goes into the market and he buys $500,000 of Government bonds. Having bought them, he takes them to the Treasury of the United States, and having complied with the law there, he is entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency 90 per cent. in bank-notes of his half a million dollars of bonds. He puts those notes afloat in the country. Then, again, here are three other men who have not got a dollar of money in the world, but they have character and credit. They want to establish a bank, and to do so they go to the banker who has organized his bank, as just suggested, and having made a paper that he is willing to accept, he loans them, upon their credit and such securities as they offer, $300,000. Having borrowed that much money, not having a dollar of their own, except as they have thus borrowed it, they go into the markets and buy $300,000 of Government bonds. They then go to the Treasury of the United States and deposit them there according to law. Thereupon they have a right to demand and receive 90 per cent. in bank currency upon those bonds, as free bankers. Having got their bank into operation, they take the very currency they received from the Comptroller and pay off their debt, and go on with their banking enterprise. In that case, instead of having $450,000 of currency put in circulation in the country upon actual capital, you have the addition of 90 per cent. of $300,000 put into circulation upon the very same capital.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I beg to remind my friend from North Carolina that the $500,000 in greenbacks in the case he supposes would not buy $500,000 of bonds, nor would the $300,000 of greenbacks buy $300,000 of bonds.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is very true; I was cognizant of what the Senator states. I was only stating the general view to show the operation of the principle involved in this matter. They would have to have a fraction more than $500,000 to get $500,000 of bonds; there is no doubt about that; but I am endeavoring to show the Senate what is involved in the supposed transactions which may be realized if the law should be as suggested. Not only one instance might arise in which a bank, therefore, could be created upon no capital at all except the naked credit of the man who desired to engage in it, but it might be done in repeated instances. Two, three, six, twenty banks might be organized virtually upon the capital that organized the first one.

Now let us see how it would be likely to operate as business is stimulated in an unnatural way throughout the country by this inflation. Let us take a man largely engaged in business. He is building a Pacific railroad; he is cutting an immense canal down South; he is engaged largely in merchandise; he is speculating in fancy stocks in New York; he is doing a hundred other things that require a vast amount of money; he is reputed throughout the nation to be a great moneyed man, and very rich. How many banks could he establish in this way, just on his naked credit? One in New York, one in Boston, one in Philadelphia, one in Washington, one in Cincinnati, one in Chicago, one in Saint Louis, one in New Orleans, one in Mobile, one in Savannah, another in Charleston, another in Raleigh; and in that way men would go on and build up such banks all over the land until the whole amount of currency that this proposed legislation would allow would be put out upon the country, and the whole land flooded with it. I need not tell the Senate, I need not tell even those gentlemen who have insisted upon this policy of inflation, (and I repeat that I use that word in no offensive sense,) that such an expansion of currency would result in general ruin and the country would not tolerate it; nor will they indorse a proposition of that sort, in my judgment. The limitation in the volume of our credit currency is essential to its life and usefulness.

On the other hand, I do not believe that the great majority of the people in this country who need money to carry on their business transactions, to make the exchanges of the country in a legitimate way, will sustain those gentlemen who insist now that we shall have contraction, which, in my judgment, can only operate to promote the interests of the money-lenders of the country. What do we see here? We see the money-lenders to a man almost opposed to the proposed increase of bank circulation. We see the money borrowers, on the other hand, not only wanting the reasonable demands of the country satisfied, but they insist that the whole land shall be filled with a depreciated currency, which, in my judgment, I repeat, would bring general ruin.

It is therefore, Mr. President, that I have felt constrained to vote against the several propositions offered that I have commented upon, and it is therefore, also, that I desire to see the Senate adopt a measure something like that which I have proposed myself. I am not anxious about that particular proposition. All I desire to see is that the circulation shall be increased in substance in the way and manner that I have indicated.

I desire to say a word or two by way of set-off to the trade reports read by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] the other day. He took that as an evidence that there was plenty of money in New York and Chicago. I have no doubt that there is plenty of money in New York and in the Eastern States; that it can be gotten there "upon call" at from 4 to 5 per cent. I have no doubt that it could be borrowed for a given time at a reasonable rate, if collaterals were put up as good as the money itself. But, sir, we know that, notwithstanding this plethora that gentlemen talk about in the New England States to-day, enterprise, industry, and every interest languishes, notwithstanding they have over $80,000,000 in excess of that distribution of the currency provided by the national banking law. If that is so in those States, what must it be in the South and West? We know in those sections that interest since the war has ranged from 1 to 1½ and 2 per cent. a month. It has even gone higher than that in my own section, and I may say throughout the South. I have known 25 per cent. paid for money in North Carolina, and under circumstances that were absolutely distressing.

I beg to read, as other gentlemen have done so and I trust it will not detract from the dignity of this place to do so, an extract from a letter I have just received from one of the most successful, practical, and sensible men in North Carolina—a cotton manufacturer there. He is not one of those who want to borrow money, such as the Senator from Missouri suggested the other day. He does not want to borrow money. He has money enough, and capital enough, to answer his purposes; but he is an observing, practical man, a cotton manufacturer, and he knows the condition of the country, and his opinion is worth a thousand opinions given by those who simply speculate upon money subjects. After making some allusion to a speech which I had the honor to deliver in the Senate some days ago, he says this:

> I hope some plan may be adopted that will throw out money enough to carry on the business of the country, for there is not a sufficient amount in circulation now to move the products. The scarcity of money up the country is terrible. Interest is from 1 to 2 per cent. per month with all the money-lenders. The panic is over in the cities, but the back country is as tight to-day as it was in October or November last. Not a bank is discounting, and if they were at 18 per cent. it would give only temporary relief. Unless something is done, the business of the country South must suffer greatly the coming season.

That opinion from such a man is worth, I repeat, a thousand opinions from those who speculate about this matter and do not understand the practical operation of business and the demands in the country away from the thoroughfares. And I may add further, that this man comes from a section of country where the people are very active and thinking.

Let me say a word now, Mr. President, in reference to the proposed recommittal of this bill. I say to the Senate frankly that I am opposed to recommitting the bill, and I am opposed to it for these reasons:

In the first place, we know the opinions of the committee. We know that the committee, with one or two exceptions, are opposed to any increase of currency, for we have heard their declarations upon the floor of the Senate to that effect. In the strongest and most peremptory terms they have said that they are opposed to any increase of the currency circulation of the country. I say, therefore, that it would be unwise to recommit this bill to a committee who entertain those views.

But, in the next place, what is the object of a reference? It is to get some information that the Senate as a body cannot reach, or to reconcile conflicting views and interests upon a proposition. In neither of those views is it necessary to make such reference.

The proposition contained in the bill reported by the committee is so plain and simple that the plainest mind in the Senate can understand it and comprehend it. It simply proposes to withdraw from the Eastern States $25,000,000 of the banking currency capital that they have received in excess of what they were allowed to have by law, and to redistribute it to the South and to the West. That is a very simple proposition. We have heard it discussed in all its phases. In my judgment, if we were to recommit it and it were to remain with the committee for twenty years, they could not give us any more information about it than we have already got. It has been discussed by nearly every gentleman in the Senate. We understand the views of each; we have compared views; it has been thoroughly and completely debated; and they can give us no light upon it further; no one pretends to suggest that they can.

Then, what is the other proposition? It is one that is simpler still in its character; one that proposes, under existing law, well settled, defined, settled by the business of the country, settled by the courts of the country, simply to increase the circulation of the banks of the country $46,000,000; and that proposition presents the naked issue, the single issue, shall we have an increase of the currency, or shall we allow it to remain at what it is now?

What further light can that committee give us? We have heard the opinions, I believe, of every member of that committee. We have either heard their opinions by a general expression of their views, or we have ascertained them by the vote of every Senator present, as to whether he favors an increase of the circulation or not. To what end, then, shall we recommit this bill but for the purpose of allowing it to remain in the hands of the committee for an indefinite period, thereby continuing the evil that the country is suffering for want of this increased circulation, or to have the committee report a bill, as gentlemen suggested yesterday evening, full of complications, containing all sorts of details that would require a discussion here that would last during the whole session, and we should adjourn leaving the country in its present condition? That would be the effect of it—of such recommittal.

I insist, and I so say to those who desire an increase of the circulation, that, in my judgment, it is their solemn duty to vote against a recommittal; that it is their duty to vote for a reconsideration of the pending question, and then let us vote, in the first place, to sustain my proposition, or one substantially like that which I have submitted, amend the motion to refer in that way, so that if the Senate shall be of opinion that the bill ought to be referred, the committee will have nothing to do but to report that proposition. Or, if we still defeat the reference, as I trust we may, then we can take a square vote upon the proposition which I have submitted to increase the currency $46,000,000, to be distributed to the South and West, and thus give that immediate relief which I had hoped the people would have received at the hands of Congress before the holidays.

I have deemed it necessary, Mr. President, to give this explanation of my views and my course in reference to the various propositions that have been brought before the Senate. I trust that I am understood. I am not ultra on one side or the other. I desire to be conservative. My people are conservative, and I am sure they will sustain me when I give conservative votes, such as that I propose to give in this instance, in their interests, and the interests equally of the whole country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SCHURZ. I wish to have the question restated once more, in order to ascertain exactly what the effect of our votes will be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion under consideration is to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] was adopted to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. SCHURZ. Is not the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee in the nature of a substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. SCHURZ. So that we have to choose by our votes whether we would not rather put the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee in the place of the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina. That is the state of the case, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the vote shall not be reconsidered and the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee shall be sustained, then it will be substituted for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, and the question will be upon that amendment as amended by the substitution.

Mr. SCHURZ. Precisely. In connection with this I will say, that although I do not agree exactly with the proposition made by the Senator from Tennessee, yet preferring it to the proposition coming from the Senator from North Carolina, I shall vote against the reconsideration.

Mr. MORTON. I simply want to say a word in regard to the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee. It is a proposition authorizing the conversion of greenbacks or legal-tender notes into 5 per cent. bonds. The object of that is at once to return to specie payments by that method. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]—I beg the attention of the Senate, for I do not intend to speak long—said last night, just at the conclusion of the debate, in speaking of this proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, which he is in favor of:

> But the money could be used in the payment of bonds. Suppose the 5 per cent. bonds are worth, as they are to-day, ninety-nine and a half cents on the dollar, these notes may be converted into 5 per cent. bonds; that makes the notes equal to bonds worth ninety-nine and a half cents on the dollar. As a matter of course the law would provide some means by which these notes might be applied to the purchase of 6 per cent. bonds; but, as the Senator properly says, the 6 per cent. bonds can only be purchased at par in gold. But we have a right by law now to pay off $12,000,000,000 of 6 per cents at par in gold. Consequently the only loss there would be to the Government would be the difference between the value of 5 per cent. bonds at 99½ or 99 and par in gold; in other words, the effect of it would be that the Government could use this money to buy gold with which to pay the bonds that would be called in.

In other words, this brings the Senate right back to the old proposition of a return to specie payments. The Senator's bill fixes it at the 1st of January, 1875, less than a year hence. I do not know what time he will put in the new bill; perhaps he will put it at a shorter time than that; but it contemplates a return to specie payments by bringing the greenbacks up to par at once, by authorizing them to be converted at par into a 5 per cent. bond that is worth par in gold. If the scheme works, it will bring about the resumption of specie payment in less than twelve months or in whatever time the committee thinks this operation should begin. In the bill the Senator from Ohio offered to the Senate some days ago he fixes the time at the 1st day of January, 1875, about ten months hence. Then it would be to return to specie payments in a little more than ten months, and in that time to overcome the difference of 10 per cent. in the value of the currency—a change of values of 10 per cent. in less than one year, which would undoubtedly produce the greatest disasters to the business of the country, increasing the volume of every man's debt to the amount of 10 per cent., increasing the value of every debt held by a creditor to the amount of 10 per cent. So that is involved in this proposition of the question of an immediate return to specie payment, or within a few months, provided the scheme works that the Senator from Ohio has so long been in favor of. He says that to authorize these notes to be converted into a bond that is at par in gold is to make the notes at par in gold, and at the same time it brings about a change of 10 per cent. in the value of the currency. A change so sudden, in my opinion, would be disastrous to the country.

I simply make these remarks for the purpose of stating what there is involved in this proposition.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should very willingly vote against this proposition, and against every proposition to instruct, if Senators on the other side would do the same; but if we must have some sort of instructions, I shall vote for those that I think are the best.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana, professing to inform the rest of us of the meaning of that instruction which we are now asked to reconsider, has placed upon it, I think, an utterly erroneous meaning, and I think he has fallen into that largely by making some remarks of the Senator from Ohio the basis of his speech, instead of considering the proposition itself; and although I do not mean to be led to answer everything from which I dissent, although I cannot suppose that I am called upon to answer every proposition which I oppose or every Senator whose views are opposed to mine, I feel reluctant, after the Senator from Ohio has stated his view of this matter, to proceed to vote, leaving it to be understood from silence that tacit assent is given by everybody to what he says.

The Senator from Indiana affirms that this is a proposition looking to specie payments, and going into some arithmetic or calculation upon words which have fallen from the Senator from Ohio, he undertakes to tell us the day and almost the hour when under this proposition specie payments are to be resumed, or something is to occur equivalent to that. Now, Mr. President, I ask all Senators to observe that the argument of the Senator from Indiana, and any other argument applied to this proposition to prove that it means specie payments, proceeds not upon what is said in this instruction, but upon that which is wholly omitted. I ask every Senator to observe that this instruction comes as near as anything which ordinary ingenuity can suggest to no instruction at all. Why? Because it directs the committee to do that which the committee can do as fully and as exactly legislating in the direction of expansion, as it can legislating in the direction of contraction. It directs the committee "to report a bill providing for the convertibility of United States Treasury notes into gold coin or 5 per cent. bonds of the United States, and also for free banking." It will be seen that contraction or expansion under the bill there demanded must depend entirely upon what is to become in the end of the United States notes. In that respect the instruction is wholly silent.

I feel, Mr. President, that it is rather an act of assumption for me to attempt to explain this to the other Senators. I do not mean my remarks in that view; but as we voted upon this amendment yesterday from simply hearing it read—as it is not yet, I believe, in print unless as it has gone into the RECORD—I trust I may be forgiven for occupying a moment in asking the attention of the Senate to this point.

United States notes under this instruction are to be converted into 5 per cent. bonds. What does that first step mean? Manifestly that bonds are to be issued or sold to the holders of United States notes in exchange for those notes. Does it not? Thus the United States notes are to reach the Treasury in lieu of bonds which the Treasury is to give for them. Stopping there a moment, does any Senator see contraction in that? Stopping there, does any Senator see expansion in that? Certainly not. Why? Because we must proceed to the next step in order to ascertain the question of expansion or contraction. If these notes which have now, under the transaction I have supposed, reached the Treasury, are to remain forever in the Treasury, if they are never to be reissued, if they are to be canceled or burnt, it does not require the aid of my eloquent friend from Indiana to tell us that that looks to contraction. Why? Because you have substituted bonds for a portion of the legal-tender circulation, and you have blotted that legal-tender circulation out of existence. Then, unless you issue some equivalent circulation, manifestly you have contraction; and if you issue national-bank note circulation, not for the face of the greenbacks, not for the face of the bonds given in exchange for the greenbacks, but for the face of the bonds less 10 per cent., I think we all can see, stopping there, that the contraction in the transaction amounts to 10 per cent. My friend by my side [Mr. HAMLIN] reminds me of an additional diminution growing out of other things, and I know he is right about that, although for simplicity I do not stop to speak of anything but the one matter of 10 per cent. between the face of the bonds and the volume of bank circulation which can be gained by hypothecating them at the Treasury Department. I think so much must be plain.

On the other hand, if in place of perpetually retaining the United States notes, or canceling or burning them, the Treasury is to hold them subject to the come and go of the day's necessities, we all see, first, that those notes are liable again to return to circulation; I think we can all see that they are certain to return to circulation; and I think that few Senators will be able to agree with the Senator from Indiana in seeing that they are to be used in the ultimate destiny and chance of things merely to buy bonds, and for nothing else.

What special quality is to attach to these particular United States notes acquired by the Treasury in exchange for bonds? Unless they are to be canceled, do they not go into the general fund? Do they not go into the balance which the Treasury possesses wherewith to pay obligations upon the Treasury? And if they do, then they become fused and merged with all the circulation and cash on hand, liable, just like the residue of it, to payment out upon every occasion. Thus they are to be paid for current expenses; thus they are to be used as portion of the balance and volume of money in the Treasury. In that view, what becomes the nature of the transaction? It is merely this: The Treasury has first emitted bonds, for what purpose? That 90 per cent. of them may be the basis of new bank circulation, and that has gone. In return for the bonds the Treasury has received United States notes, which it is to turn right around and pay out whenever the emergency arises. Can any Senator say that that means contraction; that that means a resumption of specie payments; that that means any tendency toward specie payments?

I submit, Mr. President, that whether it means contraction or expansion depends wholly upon the provision which is to be made for the United States notes in the end; and in respect of that this instruction is wholly silent. Should it go to the Committee on Finance, to the expansionists upon the committee, it means expansion; to the contractionists upon the committee, it means contraction. In other words, the Senate has instructed the committee to report a bill which shall provide one thing or provide the other thing, as the committee shall choose; both things being entirely consistent with the whole gravamen of this instruction. My friend from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] suggests that that might make an elastic currency. It certainly makes an elastic instruction. It is a sort of automatic, self-adjusting instruction, certainly containing an element of adaptation and elasticity which, if it could be infused into the currency, would make everything fit everything else, so that everybody would be pleased, and I hope everybody would be prosperous.

This being my view of this proposition, I thought it well to interpose my dissent to the construction upon which my friend from Indiana was about to have us vote, and also well to say that I shall not vote to reconsider the vote of the Senate by which this instruction was adopted, and that for the reason that I am in favor of committing this subject to the committee, and leaving the committee free to bring in the best bill it can; and inasmuch as this instruction is so near nothing that it is in its effect virtually nothing, I see no object in reconsidering the vote, to the end that we may try new experiments in advising or directing the committee what it shall do. I prefer to leave it where it is, an instruction in favor of free banking, leaving the committee to surround that measure, when they report it, with such safeguards, such restrictions, such provisions of wisdom as the committee is able to devise. I think the rest of the instruction is blank paper, and by as much as it is blank it is the best instruction that we can give.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it so happens that I did not say anything at all about expansion or contraction. I said that this proposition looked to a return to specie payment as the only thing about which it was definite. The Senator says it does not look to that; that it is not necessarily to have the effect of bringing these notes up to par value, and in that way returning to specie payments. Now, if it does not mean contraction, and if it does not mean expansion, and it does not mean a return to specie payments, what does it mean? It simply means to add something to the bonded debt, on which we shall pay 5 per cent. interest, without any object or without any purpose. The Senator from New York makes it entirely purposeless. He says it does not look to resumption. Has he heard my friend from Ohio argue from time to time here upon a similar proposition, that this would bring legal-tender notes up to par value, and that in that way we should return to specie payments without first providing gold to redeem them? Does not everybody know but my friend from New York that this is the object of redeeming the legal-tender notes in 5 per cent. bonds, in that way to bring them up to par value?

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator wishes an answer, I will say to him that he discusses some other proposition, some bill of many sections, such as that introduced at a previous session by the Senator from Ohio. The bill is not before me; it is not before the Senate; I make no observation in regard to it. When, however, he affirms that these two or three lines of instruction now lying before him mean all in general and in particular that the other long bill which he has means, I deny that as a matter of fact, and I say to him that he bases his argument on that which is not before us, instead of confining it to the few words which are before us.

Mr. MORTON. In view of the bills on our table and of the discussions that have taken place here for the last two or three months, it is extraordinary to me that anybody can profess not to understand the object of this instruction. The Senator from Ohio understood it last night at once, and he gave words to it, and I read what those words were, that the effect of it was to bring the notes up to the same value with a 5 per cent. bond—ninety-nine and one-half or one hundred cents on the dollar; and then, when the notes are called in by the 5 per cent. bonds, that those notes can be used not to buy the 6 per cent. bonds at a premium in the market, but to pay them by simply adding in gold the ½ per cent. or the 1 per cent. necessary to make a par value.

Now, there is one thing definite about these instructions, if there is nothing else definite, and that is that the committee shall bring in a bill "providing for the convertibility of United States Treasury notes into gold coin or 5 per cent. bonds of the United States, and also for free banking under the provisions of the national-bank act." True, as the Senator has said, it leaves the committee free to cancel these notes as they come in or to pay them out again, as the Senator from Ohio provides in his bill introduced a few days ago. It leaves the committee free upon that point either to produce contraction, or, as the Senator from New York says, to produce expansion. He cannot show the expansion, however. But it is definite upon the point of reporting a bill for a 5 per cent. bond into which the legal-tender notes shall be converted; and if the purpose of that is not return to specie payments, then it is to create a bonded debt without object.

But we know, at least I supposed we did know, that the only object in providing for the conversion of legal-tender notes into 5 per cent. bonds was to give them a par value, and in that way return to what is called specie payment. That is what this thing means. The Senator from Ohio understood it so last night, and so said in substance, and I read his remarks. If it does not mean that, it does not mean anything. But in view of the bills on our table, the arguments, and the inevitable purpose of the thing, it seems to me very strange to hear it said that this does not look toward specie payments. It does look to it, and it looks to it speedily; and looks to it so suddenly as likely, in my judgment, to produce disastrous consequences in the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Indiana is determined to have the last word, and I will let him have it. He is making a reply to a speech I made a year ago.

Mr. CONKLING. On another bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. On another bill.

Mr. MORTON. I read the Senator's remarks of last night in regard to this very instruction, in which he defined the effect of this instruction to be to report a bill that brings the greenback up to ninety-nine and a half cents or to par in gold. Does the Senator say that that was made a year ago?

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask my honorable friend from Indiana whether he thinks we ought to vote upon what the Senator from Ohio says he understands a thing to be or upon the thing itself? The Senator from Indiana argues that the Senator from Ohio said at some time that he understood a certain thing. Now we have here three or four lines of instruction before us. They are in plain English. It is upon that that we are to vote, and I supposed in voting upon it we were to take the language and see what it meant, and not resort to the RECORD to see what a Senator had said he thought it might mean.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I merely desire to say that I shall vote against the reconsideration of this instruction, but I do not mean thereby to commit myself that I shall vote in favor of any bill that may be reported by the Finance Committee under it, as there is so much latitude that I can foresee that a bill might very possibly be reported here that I could not support.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I shall vote for reconsidering the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, because I think it presents to the country a false hope. It pretends to give to the country relief when there is no such relief in it. It sends to a committee, adverse to what I believe is the interest of the country just now, a proposition for their consideration, in which we give to them the authority of their high position to place before the country their own opinions in contradistinction to what I believe to be the interest of the country just now. The country needs help. The panic is not over. Money is said to be plenty in New York. It may be plenty among the money-changers, who just use their money for the moment and for their own momentary benefit; but it is not plenty in the country among the business men, among the farmers, among the men who toil for their living, who want help, who have no capital but their labor, and who want the assistance of money, or the representative of money, to enable them to bring their labor into useful operation. I predict that if this Congress adjourns without adopting some measure of relief, there will be distress ten times greater than there was last autumn. The practical evidence to my mind that the country needs money is that it is plentiful in New York, ready to be loaned daily for a profit, apparently a small percentage, but a great profit to those people who speculate upon money.

I believe the proposition which I presented the other day would, if adopted, be of great service to the country; I believe so still; but I am willing to unite with any gentleman in any measure which in my judgment will tend to convince the country that Congress is willing to relieve them in their troubles. I am not willing to have it said that I am in favor of a measure which will embarrass the industry of the country for the benefit of the speculators of the country, as I am sure this measure will.

The proposition—and it is the same as presented the other day by the Senator from Ohio—is to compel specie payments immediately, and when I say immediately I mean within a year or two. I am desirous that the resumption of specie payments shall come certainly, but that it shall come when the country is prepared for it. We are not prepared for it now; we are not ready for it now; and we do not need it. Specie is the mere measure of the currency of the country. For the present we need help, we need assistance to the laborer and the miner, the manufacturer and the farmer, and the business men generally. This brings no relief, but it pretends to relieve those whom it is going to destroy.

An immediate resumption of specie payments will enrich the speculator, will still further enrich the rich man, and will impoverish the poor man; and it will make the enterprising man sink down, and instead of his being enterprising it will destroy all his energies and impoverish him. Therefore I am not in favor of any such measure as this, and I cannot see how an American Senate, legislating for the people of the country, can be induced to go into a speculative measure which must, in my judgment, and I think in the judgment of every business man, destroy the business of the country.

Mr. LOGAN. I desired to present this morning, but did not have the opportunity, a petition on this subject, and I now ask permission of the Senate to present a petition from citizens of Chicago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks leave, out of order, to present a petition from citizens of Chicago. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOGAN. This petition is signed by 1,090 citizens of Chicago, of all classes, except the large bankers—signed by mechanics, by merchants, by manufacturers, and by citizens of Chicago generally. It is not signed by the large bankers. There are 1,090 names of respectable people to this petition asking for an increase of the currency.

While I am up I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one point in the proposition pending, and I shall detain the Senate but for a moment. I noticed last night that there was quite a disposition on the part of some gentlemen to oppose this measure, thinking it was inflation and expansion, and so many other things that we could not tell anything about it. There are reasons that always govern our judgment and that induce us sometimes to change our previous opinions. I have not changed mine, however, in reference to this proposition. If I understand the proposition, it is an instruction to the Committee on Finance to report a bill for free banking with this condition, that it shall be established upon the theory that a redemption of the United States notes shall be commenced with a 5 per cent. United States bond, or with gold, at the pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury. That is what I understand to be the purport and meaning of this instruction. These 5 per cent. bonds of course must in future be issued. There is not to be redemption in any other way, as I understand, unless by the Government creating an indebtedness which will redeem this currency. That is my understanding of it, and the understanding of the Senator who presented it, I think.

What is the effect of that? We have now out $400,000,000 of United States currency drawing no interest whatever. We are entitled to bank on the bonds already issued by the Government drawing interest, and which draw no more interest when used as a banking basis than when in the hands of individuals. We issue 5 per cent. bonds and with them redeem United States notes drawing no interest. Then by giving a thousand-dollar bond for $1,000 in United States notes, the Government pays fifty dollars interest on that for one year. The person who receives that bond can redeposit it in the Treasury of the United States and receive 90 per cent. in currency. On that currency he receives, say, 6 per cent. interest. There is $104 interest paid to him, of which the Government pays fifty. That is the whole thing.

We are advocating, if we advocate this, a proposition causing the Government to pay 5 per cent. gold interest on the United States currency upon which we do not now pay a cent. That is all there is of it except what has been said by others in reference to the immediate return to specie payments. I merely wished to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are creating a loan of the Government on which we pay interest to redeem that upon which we pay no interest. We only pay interest now on the bonds that are the basis of the banking currency, but this is to pay interest on the basis of redemption—a very different proposition.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I shall vote for reconsideration, if for no other reason than that the proposed instructions, under the interpretation given by the Senator from New York, are no instructions to the committee. It will be remembered that this bill, if it should now go back to the committee, becomes in its present form the substantial response to the resolution which came to the Senate as an invitation from the committee for some expression of the Senate. Now I say, under the interpretation given by the Senator from New York, by which these instructions mean either expansion or contraction, and neither one nor the other, it is left entirely to the construction of the committee, and will inevitably be left to the major judgment of that committee. The Senate will understand that the committee were divided when they were considering the question of finance, and because they could not agree they came to the Senate for instructions; and now we have the peculiar position before us, under the interpretation of the Senator from New York, that the pending instructions send the matter back without any judgment whatever of the Senate.

Now, I ask the Senator from New York and Senators whether justice to the committee does not require a vote upon expansion as well as contraction? The Senate has pronounced its judgment upon the question of free banking adversely. Certain Senators who are in favor of an increase of the currency are a little afraid of too much inflation, and have defeated the proposition for free banking. Is it not a fairer course to meet the request of the committee and let the Senate, after a reconsideration of this vote, pass another judgment upon it; and if the former one be reversed, then vote upon the simple issue, will the Senate advise an increase or not? No test of the Senate has been taken on an expansion of the currency. It cannot be argued that it has under the form of free banking. Some hesitate to vote for an unrestricted measure of this kind, and have not been willing to support it. With all the restrictions of reserved capital, the apprehensions of redemption, and the actual capital demanded to organize banks, I have no fear of free banking based upon 90 per cent. of Government bonds worth more than par in gold. If it is good for a monopoly it should be as beneficial for the populace. A free government should legislate for equality to all of its citizens.

The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is simply an increase of forty-six millions of national currency. The very resolution introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Finance asking the judgment of the Senate was in form of an amendment proposed by myself, the question of a moderate increase of the currency. That is the pending one on that resolution, but you have a proposition that by priority supplants it now, in the nature of instructions to your committee, which for the present sets that aside.

Now I ask Senators if it is not simple fairness that you should declare the judgment of the Senate explicitly, and not, by finesse of construction, deprive the Senate of the expression of that judgment upon really the vital question of an increase or not. The Senate has not yet been given an opportunity to express itself upon this, and the country awaits with solicitude the determination whether the Senate is in favor of expansion or contraction. That has not yet been settled; and I ask in behalf of the minority of the committee, speaking for none else than myself, and not even for those who accord with me, I entreat for an unequivocal expression, yea or nay, that I may be instructed as to the will of the Senate, so that when these instructions come for consideration before the committee I may know whether the elasticity characterized by the Senator from New York applies toward increase, or whether it applies toward contraction. I am opposed to contraction. I believe it imperils the interests of the country, and will be prejudicial to the commercial and industrial relations of the nation. Believing that in committee, believing that in my seat now, I shall act in committee again as my judgment leads me to speak now, unless the direct instructions of the Senate control me otherwise. If instructed to contract, I shall roll the responsibility upon the Senate; but if the interpretation suggested prevails, and it is understood that the instructions really mean nothing, I go back to the committee-room with my own convictions upon expansion; and the honorable chairman of the committee, and the majority, go back with their unchanged views of contraction, so that the committee will find itself beyond the possibility of agreement.

So I say, Mr. President, in all fairness, let this vote be reconsidered; let the question be retaken on the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, and if that is reversed, then let a vote follow upon the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina; and whether carried or rejected the committee can then act, and carry out the will of the Senate.

Anxious as I am to reach this determination, and put the country at rest upon the policy of Congress, I forbear consuming more time upon this question.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, before voting on this subject I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance the practical operation of the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from Tennessee, and which we now propose to reconsider. Assuming that there is not over—and I merely take the round sum for the purpose of argument—$300,000,000 of greenbacks in circulation, will they not be presented to the Treasury of the United States under this proposition if you pass a bill to that effect; and will not the Treasury of the United States, in default of coin, be compelled to issue the bonds of the United States bearing 5 per cent. in lieu of them? I ask that question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am surprised at the question. This instruction contains two simple ideas. One is, that banking shall be free; that what is called monopoly shall be broken up. The other is, that the Government of the United States will take some steps toward redeeming its promise, either in coin or bonds. As to the details, of which my friend inquires of me, I do not want to commit myself pro or con. My friend from Indiana holds me responsible for a speech made a year ago—and I believe in that; but I expect to give and take a great deal before this great controversy is settled. I would desire very much to accomplish these two ideas. My opinions are the same now that they were then; but I expect, as a matter of course, to yield my opinions somewhat to those of others.

When the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] offered this proposition yesterday, I could see that it was very general and dependent on the details that might be added to it; and therefore when my friend from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] asks me what would be the effect of this particular proposition, I simply say the effect of it is that if the Senate recommit this matter with this instruction, it will have advanced two simple ideas, one that banking shall be free, and the other that we shall take some step toward the appreciation of our notes either in coin or bonds.

Mr. WEST. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator deems it inexpedient to answer the question that I propounded to him, let me state to the Senate what is the answer that suggests itself to me in connection with it. Here are $300,000,000 of the national currency, greenbacks, in existence. Under this provision the first impulse of every man who holds them will be to present them to the Treasury of the United States and to call for their redemption in 5 per cent. bonds. The bankers who have them all over the country will bring them in, and in lieu of them they will get the bonds of the United States bearing 5 per cent. interest, which cost the Government annually in consequence thereof $15,000,000. They will take those very same bonds and go back to the Treasury of the United States, under the free-banking clause, and demand 90 per cent., or $270,000,000 of national-bank currency. Consequently in calling in your notes you subject your Government to the charge of $15,000,000 annual interest, and you have only curtailed your currency 10 per cent. That is all there is of it. The natural inclination of every man will be, following out the invitation offered by the Senator from Illinois in the statement of his $1,000 note, to bring it in and get fifty dollars a year from the Treasury, and then take the currency and loan it out at 6 per cent. and get fifty-four dollars more, whereas now he only can get 6 per cent. on his $1,000, or sixty dollars. Consequently by this proposition you are going to put it into the power of the national banking institutions of the country to get $104 a year interest for a thousand, where now they only get sixty dollars, and of that the Government of the United States has got to pay fifty dollars, if I understand the language of the instruction. I shall vote for its reconsideration.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I thought last evening when this instruction was read that I understood very clearly what it meant; but I have been rather confused this morniug by the statement made by the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] that it meant one of two things. But, notwithstanding his statement, on further looking at the amendment, I am perfectly clear that it can mean but one thing, which is a contraction of the present volume of the currency; and although the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance carefully avoids answering that question, yet, when we look at the condition of the currency to-day as compared with 5 per cent. bonds, what is the inevitable effect of this amendment? Five per cent. bonds yesterday were worth in the New York market 114 in currency, when gold was worth but 112. Therefore, there is a difference to-day between greenbacks and these 5 per cent. bonds of 14 per cent. in favor of the bonds. Is it not apparent to every Senator that under this proposition every man who holds a greenback dollar will take it to the Treasury for the 5 per cent. bond in order to make that 14 per cent. immediately? Is there anything plainer than that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Is it probable that the Secretary of the Treasury, by any law that would be proposed by the Committee on Finance, would offer the bonds in exchange to the holders of notes without offering them in market and getting all the advantage there was?

Mr. ALLISON. I am speaking of this instruction. It is a bill providing for the "convertibility," not the sale. Therefore every man who holds a greenback is entitled, under the instruction, to go to the Secretary of the Treasury and say, "I want the coin or a 5 per cent. bond." There is nothing plainer than that; and therefore I am amazed at any Senator saying that there is a confusion in reference to this instruction. It is, in effect, substantially the measure proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, which, he has told us over and over again, means resumption of specie payments or an effort in that direction. And why does he make that statement? It is because he expects to reduce the volume of the greenback currency by this convertibility into 5 per cent. bonds. Therefore every proposition that has been presented by the chairman of the Committee on Finance looks to the conversion of the greenback into a bond of the United States; which means, in other words, that there shall be a reduction of its volume, and under this instruction every greenback that is issued can be converted into a 5 per cent. bond, at the option of the holder of that greenback. There is nothing plainer. Therefore there is substance in this instruction, and such substance as will lead me to vote for a reconsideration, so that the Committee on Finance shall know whether or not the Senate proposes a reduction, immediate, without limit, of the volume of the greenback currency.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I did not suppose that I could be persuaded to utter another word upon this subject in its present condition, and I do not mean any offense when I say that it strikes me that this matter is anomalous in its character. I doubt whether the Senate of the United States ever in its history exhibited itself in a character so questionable in a parliamentary sense as it has since this proposition has been before it. Now, sir, what is the position of the Senate of the United States? On a simple proposition which everybody desires, which everybody in the Senate for these four years has desired, simply to execute a measure for the redistribution and equalization of the currency inaugurated in 1870, we insist upon airing our opinions upon the whole subject of finance; and gentlemen, day after day, week after week, month after month, to the exclusion of other business, iterate and reiterate, repeat, affirm, and reaffirm, their conscientious conviction in their several theories—all of them theories pretty much—very little fact anyway. I have sat here quietly listening to these things until my brain is in such a muddle upon this whole question called finance that I pray God to be relieved some how or other of any further discussion upon this subject. [Laughter, and indications of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Approbation is out of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, it is very embarrassing, to say the least of it. My honorable friend who has just taken his seat [Mr. ALLISON]—and he knows my admiration of him is such that I could not do an offense under any circumstances—goes into a rhapsody over this question of inflation every time he has an opportunity. He wants us to understand that under any circumstances and in any situation of life he is for inflation, or I believe he denominated it as expansion. On the other hand, there are others who take the other extreme and say that they are for contraction. I believe my honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] began with the assertion that he was for moderate expansion. But, Mr. President, here, at the end of two months, what astonishes me is that when all this contrariety of opinion has been disclosed—and if we see anything clear we must see that nothing can be reached here—we hesitate to send the bill to a committee who can consider it and return to the Senate some plan, some proposition which shall form the nucleus at least of rational and intelligent discussion. Gentlemen agonize on this floor as if some great advantage was to be gained by some vote in favor of inflation or in favor of contraction; as if it would be a wise and important thing to establish a fact of that sort before the bill goes back to the committee; that unless the committee are hampered, or, in other words, unless the committee are enlightened by some vote that may be taken on this subject, when the votes are running so close, as are exhibited by the RECORD of yesterday, there is fear that this committee will not be inspired with some wholesome views upon the whole subject of finance. Is it not clear to-day, after these two months' discussion, that nothing is to be gained by the continuance of this discussion further? Is there anything clearer than that if we intend an intelligent consideration of this whole question we must commit it to a committee sooner or later? And what is to be gained by procrastinating this debate?

My honorable friend from Michigan insists upon it that he will know for his own benefit, if he can, what is the sense of the Senate upon expansion. Well, sir, if he had been an intelligent observer of the votes that were taken yesterday he might guess what the sense of the Senate is upon the question of an indefinite issue of irredeemable paper, to say the least of it. Let us see. There was a distinct proposition before the Senate upon that subject, free banking, free issue of irredeemable paper; and I have before me the vote of the Senate. What are the inferences to be drawn from that? Clearly that the Senate of the United States is not prepared to launch upon an illimitable sea of irredeemable currency, call it expansion, call it inflation, call it what you please; set it down that the Senate of the United States, if the vote means anything, means that we hesitate to enter upon that sea. Further, a vote was taken upon the question of instructing the committee "to report a bill for free banking and providing for the convertibility of the United States Treasury notes into low-interest bonds or gold coin." Is there any significance in that vote? If so, which way does it tend? I do not undertake to assert here; but it shows a contrariety of opinion which cannot be harmonized on this floor; and it is idle, in my judgment, to talk about it.

Now, sir, I do not care a penny for the instructions of your votes to this committee. What we want is some information, some plan, some proposition from this organ of the Senate, growing out of the experience or information which they have obtained from this discussion; and, in my judgment, the propriety of the whole thing is to let this subject go back to them without being hampered one way or the other. They can probably form their own judgment as to what the Senate will be likely to do on any proposition they may submit from what has taken place since this discussion began. And, in my judgment, they will be feelingly alive to the best interests of the country, and also they will regard the facts which have been developed here, and we shall be much more likely to get a proposition which will be satisfactory to the whole country than we shall if we undertake to hamper this committee by a vote which may be an expression one way or the other, and which may fail to be an expression by a single member or a half-dozen members being out of their seats.

Mr. President, I rose to appeal to Senators to cease to struggle any longer upon the question of inflation or the question of contraction, but to allow this whole subject of finance raised upon this bill, which involves the simple question of the equalization of the circulation by a redistribution, to go back to the committee unhampered, and, pray, let us take the vote at the present time.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments. Verily, sir, we have made some strange discoveries in the progress of this discussion. I do not think we are laboring in vain.

The honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] who has just taken his seat has made the discovery that the old adage that "there is safety in the multitude of council" is false; that we ought not to deliberate, but refer the question without instruction to the committee; that it is safer to trust this question, which is of more vital interest to the people than any which has or can be brought before us, to a half-dozen Senators, four out of six of whom agree with him in opinion, than to trust it to the whole body of the representatives of the people.

Sir, I take issue with the honorable Senator. There is wisdom in consultation. I am unwilling to commit without instructions. I am a firm believer in the old adage that in the multitude of council there is safety. I am also as firmly convinced that the Committee on Finance neither represents the wishes nor the best interests of this country. On examination of this committee I find that there are but two who favor any increase of the currency; and we are asked to recommit this whole question to that committee without any instructions whatever. Who is not able to predict in advance the character of the bill which will come from the committee?

But the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] has also made a discovery. He tells us there is no difference between the proposition submitted by myself and that submitted by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER,] although the latter provides for carrying money into the Treasury without any provision for bringing it again into circulation, which is contraction; while the other, which I had the honor to submit, provides for both carrying money into the Treasury, by allowing conversion of greenbacks into low-interest bonds, and for bringing currency again into circulation when needed by providing for the reconversion of the bonds into greenbacks at the option of the holder; yet the honorable Senator from North Carolina can see no difference between the two. Both are modifications of the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania for free banking. Yet the honorable Senator from North Carolina refuses to vote either for the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania for free banking without modification, or for the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee for free banking with the provision which would limit its operations; or for the proposition submitted by myself, which provides for free banking with the privilege of converting greenbacks into bonds when currency was redundant and bonds into greenbacks when currency was scarce and interest exorbitant or panic prevailed. Still the Senator can see no difference in them, and refuses his support to either. He prefers to let the monopoly stand, and grant a limited increase to its power in the hands of the few and trust to legislation hereafter. He thus refuses, when the opportunity is afforded, to strike down the monopoly under which his own people now suffer, and which has well-nigh ground them to powder.

I confess to have witnessed with pain and amazement the course of the honorable Senator from my sister State in this trying emergency. When the great question of all other questions involved in this controversy is presented, as to whether this monopoly was to be perpetuated in this country, that the Senator who had stood beside us heretofore should be found now in the ranks of the opposition fills me with pain and amazement. Sir, I commend him to his constituency. I know not how he will be able to answer them; and while he assures me that he welcomes the responsibility, let me say that I rejoice that that responsibility is his and not mine. Sir, rather than give a vote on this floor to fasten upon the necks of my people the yoke which they now wear—the burden of this monopoly weighing us down with 25 per cent. money—I would see this right hand wither at my side. I must be pardoned for saying that I do not believe any of the producers from my section agree with the Senator from North Carolina. Let me say to him that they dread far more the power of money in the hands of the few than any disasters which could follow a redundancy of circulation.

But let that be as it may, if the honorable Senator will not join us in striking down this great monster, I am glad to say that I shall join him in accomplishing a much less good—the increase of currency under the monopoly. I shall go to him to secure the less if he will not join me in securing the greater good. With all my respect for the honorable Senator I must be permitted to say that I was deeply pained to find that in the very hour of our trial and of our triumph, when we lacked but two votes of carrying the greatest proposition we have had before us, which would have secured the absolute redemption of our people, we should lose those two votes from those who had hitherto stood by our side.

But let us now look at the position we occupy before the country. We refuse to the people a free-banking law, with redemption of greenbacks in low-interest bonds, and have voted them free banking only upon conditions so burdensome to the tax-payers as to destroy its value to the people. The amendment we have voted provides that greenbacks may be returned to the Treasury by the holders—the bankers—who shall receive for them bonds which the honorable Senator from Iowa has just shown are worth more than gold to-day in the market. In other words, it is an actual, immediate resumption of specie payments, and putting our greenbacks above par at a fearful cost to the people. That is the effect of it unquestionably; and I defy any Senator on this floor to meet that fact. If the holder of $100 in greenbacks can go to the Treasury, at the other end of this avenue, and deposit it and receive a bond therefor of $100, and carry that bond to New York and sell it for more than $100 in gold, have we not instituted more than resumption here in a single day? Have we not, instead of giving relief, doubled the burdens of the people?

But Senators seem to have made another singular discovery, namely, that the way to rid us of our troubles is to ask the bankers how to get out. I have been surprised at the presentation of petition after petition, memorial after memorial, from the bankers of the country who seek to guide us out of our troubles. Sir, when British power sought to crush the liberties of the Colonies, when they groaned beneath the heel of British tyranny, how is it that our fathers did not discover that they must fly to British authority for the means of escape from that power? That, I humbly conceive, would have been quite as rational a course as the one pursued in asking the money-power to liberate us.

The bankers, who secure their 25 per cent. per annum; the bankers, who number less, probably, than 2,000,000 of the 42,000,000 of this people; the bankers, who do not number one-tenth, scarcely one-twentieth, of our population, yet who furnish its entire currency, and out of the sweat and the toil of the laborer, grow rich, while the producer grows poor—these are the men who flood this Chamber with their memorials. To these we are asked to lend an ear, while concentrated capital clutches by the throat and strangles the industries of the people.

Monopoly! It is a great monopoly, Mr. President, in my judgment, when a few men have the power of forcing the large number who produce the wealth to pay such rates of interest as destroy all prosperity.

But we are told by the honorable Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Finance Committee, that the adoption of the proposition submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania is the death-knell of the national banks. I am unable to see how it is the death-knell of the national banks; but I have this to add, that I would rather it were the death-knell of the power which has crushed us than the death-knell of the productions which support us. If one is to perish, let monopoly perish, and in God's name let it perish first. I readily admit that the passage of that measure would be the death-knell of monopoly in the money of the country. It would be the death-knell of 25 per cent. interest. But, sir, the same knell that tolled its death would also announce a new birth to the productive energies of the people which now languish in this country.

But the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has also made the discovery that to increase our irredeemable paper would be, to use his figure and his own eloquent language, "to launch this country on a sea without shore or bottom." I have something to say in this connection. For my part I would rather that it should be launched on a sea that had no bottom and no shore than on the sea upon which the productive interests of this country are now launched—a sea that has neither depth of water nor breadth of water on which to float a solitary industry of this nation. We are already launched on a sea, and it is a most disastrous sea, as the statistics of failures will abundantly prove. It is a most disastrous sea, as the memorial introduced by the honorable Senator from Illinois but a few moments ago will show. It is a most disastrous sea, as we learn from every section, with the exception of the moneyed East. It is a sea where breakers are thick, where the shores are narrow, where the water is shallow. It is a sea upon which the good ship of our prosperity has already been stranded. It lies there now, with its sails all rent and its masts all riven; and every effort to remantle it is defeated by this monopoly which controls it.

But to drop the figure suggested by the eloquent Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] let me repeat what I have said before, that in a new and growing country and a country burdened with debt there is infinitely greater disaster to follow insufficiency of money than an abundant supply.

Before I close, I desire to admonish Senators who turn a deaf ear to the producing classes that they mistake if they suppose this question can be settled against the demands of the people in this Congress. No, sir; the laboring classes, the producing classes, have drawn the sword on this question, and I trust they will throw away the scabbard and never sheathe it until we have secured a currency which shall not belong to a few, but which shall make the phrase "equal rights," not a mockery as it is now, but a tangible reality. Sir, money is a great power. I know what I confront when in my place here I venture to assail it. I know what it has accomplished in the legislation of this country heretofore. I know what it seeks to accomplish to-day; but the people will triumph in the end. The old feudal power was strong; but it was broken; and as sure as the feudal power was vanquished, as sure as the serfs were emancipated from that system, so sure, year after year, at the recurring elections in the North, in the West, and in the South, the producing classes of this country will unite as one man, and, despising party politics, will rise in their majesty and demand that this monopoly shall no longer exist.

But, sir, I have said more than I intended. I trust this motion to reconsider will prevail.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. Mr. President, I do not rise to enter into this discussion at all, but to endeavor to bring the discussion to a close. Early in the session the Committee on Finance introduced into the Senate resolutions embodying the views of the different members of that committee, upon which, by their chairman, they asked an expression of the opinion of the Senate. While those resolutions were pending the committee brought in a bill for a specific object, and upon that bill the discussion which they asked for upon their resolutions has gone on till the present time, and until that discussion, in my judgment, is entirely exhausted. It has also, I think, become apparent that if the discussion is permitted to proceed the bill upon which the discussion is nominally going on cannot pass, and as all the enlightenment which the committee desired when they introduced their resolution must now have been obtained, and as it is apparent that the specific bill before us cannot pass, and as I believe that every Senator here desires that this discussion shall be brought to an end, and as, if it is brought to an end, the general subject of finance will be in the hands of the committee precisely the same as if the bill were recommitted without instructions, I now move that the bill and the amendments be laid upon the table.

Mr. MERRIMON. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WEST. I should like to ask what the effect of the vote will be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BOREMAN in the chair.) The motion is to lay the bill, with the amendments, on the table. It will carry everything with it, in the opinion of the Chair.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Mississippi, Mr. ALCORN. If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I presume my pair with the Senator from Kansas, Mr. INGALLS, extends to this question. If he were present, I suppose he would vote against the motion; I should vote in favor of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. RANSOM. If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The result was then announced—yeas 17, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Ferry of Connecticut, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Jones, Kelly, Sargent, Schurz, Stewart, Stockton, Sumner, and Wadleigh—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Davis, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, West, and Wright—36.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Brownlow, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Gilbert, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Ingalls, Lewis, Ransom, Saulsbury, Sprague, Thurman, Tipton, and Windom—20.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion to reconsider the instructions moved by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER.]

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this debate; but as the discussion has gone on, there have been so many appeals in behalf of poor men and in favor of expansion, that I cannot but call the attention of the Senate for one moment to this resolution of instruction:

And that the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, instructed to report a bill providing for the convertibility of United States Treasury notes into gold coin or 5 per cent. bonds of the United States.

Now, I want to know if there is anything dishonest or wrong in that proposition, taken by itself? The United States have agreed to do this very thing; and their agreement has stood repudiated for the last twelve years, and it has been the principal thing that has brought reproach upon the country. It is the only instance in the last forty years.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish the Senator would yield to me a moment.

Mr. STEWART. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. CAMERON. Will not the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. I prefer to go on. I simply rose to say a few words, and shall be through very soon.

I say the United States have agreed to do this, and it is the only solemn agreement that the United States has made for many, many years that it has repudiated for this length of time; and it is the one thing that affects the credit of the United States more than anything else. This proposition simply proposes as a matter of honesty and fairness to pay this debt as we agreed to do, and to take up this irredeemable stuff. There is nothing very dishonest in that. It is simply a question of honesty or dishonesty, whether the Government of the United States intends to pay its debts as it has agreed to do. What is the next proposition?

And also for free banking, under the provisions of the national-bank act.

Is there anything very monstrous in that proposition? I heard the Senator from Georgia a moment ago delivering himself of a most eloquent oration. He appealed to the people against this monster, the national-bank system, because it was a monopoly, and he called upon the people to array themselves against this monopoly. This resolution proposes to destroy the monopoly feature of that system and to open it to everybody. Is there anything very wrong about that?

Mr. LOGAN. That is what we have been trying to do.

Mr. STEWART. This resolution proposes to do that very thing. Senators say it will cost something to do it. It costs something to be honest; it always costs something to pay your debts; but it is better for the United States to pay its debts than to lose its honor. Of course it will cost something, but it will not cost the laboring man a cent. It will give him money that has a purchasing power; so that he can buy clothing for his children and for himself. It will cost the speculator something who runs up prices on this irredeemable trash; it will bring him down to the bed-rock; but it will give the money that the laboring man receives for his hire a purchasing power, so that he can live and buy his bread.

But Senators say this is contraction. I doubt very much whether it would be contraction. At all events, under it we can have all the money that we can earn and pay for; there is no limitation and no monopoly. If by means of this process greenbacks are funded it will be because they are worth less than 5 per cent. per annum in the hands of the people, for if they are worth more than 5 per cent. per annum they will never go into these bonds. If they are worth in their hands more than 5 per cent. per annum, they will keep them. But if it is really true that this money is not worth 5 per cent. per annum in the hands of the people, let us exchange it for something that is worth more. Then these greenbacks will be delivered up if they are worth less than 5 per cent. per annum, and not otherwise.

What will be done with the capital that goes into the bonds? You can deposit those bonds and establish a national bank anywhere you please. Delivering them up will not destroy your capital. With it you buy bonds, and with those bonds you can establish national banks. By this process the Government of the United States will redeem a pledge which it has solemnly made, in which its honor is involved. By this process the greenbacks, if they are worth less than 5 per cent. per annum, will be delivered up. By this process the monopoly of national banks will be disposed of, and we shall have free banking open to everybody. By this process we shall come to a specie basis, and when the laboring man receives a dollar it will have the purchasing power of a dollar, and he will not be called upon to do what is impossible for him or for the producing classes to do, figure upon the exchanges, figure upon the fluctuations, figure upon the gambling in New York; but he will know what his money is worth. Gold is the universal standard of the world. Everybody knows what a dollar in gold is worth.

This experiment of issuing irredeemable paper has been tried by almost every nation and in almost every age, and it has been condemned as often as it has been tried. Do you think that this generation is wiser than all that have gone before, or that this nation is wiser than all the other nations of the earth? Certainly not. You cannot pay your debts with paper; you must pay them with value. Any one can see that you might inflate and print more money, and continue to do it and lessen its purchasing power until you deranged all the industries of the country; and you might go so far that printing upon your paper would depreciate its value rather than increase it. That has been the case. France went so far that the paper after it was printed was not worth so much as it was before. That may be done by us if we are as wild and as crazy as they were.

In a time of profound peace, with the ability to redeem our pledge, we hesitate whether we will accept of the universal standard of value established by all civilized nations. We hesitate whether we will give the laboring man a dollar which has purchasing power enough to support him. We hesitate whether we will stop the speculation in gold in New York. We hesitate whether we will take out of the hands of middle-men the capacity to eat up the wealth of the country. We hesitate whether the profits of this land shall all concentrate in the commercial centers, where money is the object of trade, where organizations are formed for the purpose of getting rich on your depreciated currency and robbing the producer. We hesitate whether we shall be honest and fair; the Senate hesitates; and the Senators appeal to the people in speeches, and call upon them to throttle the banks, to throttle the monopoly, to bring down the rate of interest. This proposition is the very thing that throttles dishonesty, and it is the very thing that we want. We want a proposition against dishonesty; we want the nation to redeem its pledge, and we want banks established on a basis of value that the world understands; that the humblest laboring man can understand.

Whatever we may do here to-day, whatever changes may be wrought in this matter, we shall ultimately come back to specie payments; but whenever we do come back to specie payments, we shall come with a struggle. There never will be a time when we can do it better than now. Expand to-day, and you encourage speculation; and when you try to pay your debts, there will be an effort to resist it then as now. You never will get nearer to it unless you walk in that direction.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator says he is in favor of specie payments. If he is in favor of specie payments, why does he wish to insert a redemption by bonds in this bill? Why not redeem in specie?

Mr. STEWART. I wish to do it, because we have agreed to pay this debt in specie, but we have not got the gold to pay it.

Mr. LOGAN. Then we have no gold to pay for the bonds.

Mr. STEWART. If we have not got the gold to pay it, let us give our note bearing interest. Let us not repudiate our debt because we have got poor, because we have not the money; but let us adopt the alternative, and give our note bearing interest. If a man who cannot pay his debt when called upon to do so should refuse also to pay interest to his creditor, he would soon lose his character in the commercial world as an honest man; he could not sustain his credit for an hour.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator says he is in favor of specie payments, but he does not go for that now, because we have not got the specie. Now he proposes to redeem in bonds. Let me ask him what he proposes to pay the bonds with?

Mr. STEWART. I do not propose to pay the bond by starting a printing press; I do not propose to pay the bond by issuing irredeemable currency; I propose to pay the bond with value; I propose to pay it in gold, from the earnings and taxation of the people; and that is the only way it can be paid. I repudiate the idea of repudiation here. The bonds can be only paid in one way, and every honest man knows it. I would say to the man who holds this dishonored paper, "I will pay you in gold if I have got it; the Secretary is authorized by this measure to pay you in gold if he has got it; but if he has not, I will stand by the pledge so far as I can; I will give you my note bearing interest." And that is honest.

Mr. President, I did not intend to occupy the attention of the Senate so long as I have; but I could not forbear saying this much in response to this appeal of Senators for an unlimited or a limited, or a moderate or a great amount of irredeemable currency to further distract the country, to further encourage speculation, to further oppress the poor, to further eat up the resources of this country, to invite more panics. I do protest against a further repudiation of the promises of the Government. I do protest against any attempt to pay debts with irredeemable paper, because it is false in theory, false in fact, false in principle. It has been tried a thousand times, and has always left a black mark upon the nation that tried it—a mark always to be regretted. We have now the power to keep our obligation; it is a time of profound peace. And let me say to Senators that I believe if you will invite gold here by making it a commodity that can be used, if you will redeem your greenbacks, if you will allow any company to bank that will comply with the banking laws and put up the proper securities, forty million people will get the gold. Eighty million dollars is produced annually from your mines. We have resources abundant to get the gold. Forty million people can furnish all the money that is necessary. They will get it. When gold is invited to a country like this, with such an industrious people as we have, with our industry and our resources, I say there will be no difficulty about getting sufficient gold.

Why, sir, everything you have got is measured by gold. Your greenbacks are measured by gold. But your contrivance is so uncertain, that the middle-man reaps all the reward, while the producer is robbed continuously. Under this proposition you will have just as much money in the country, and more, because gold will then be worth something; gold will not be excluded. Of course, if you treat it as a commodity and export it from the country, you are not going to have gold. If you are going to have gold in this country, you must make a demand for gold by using it. Do not treat it unkindly in this way. In every country where gold has been treated unkindly, where the government has favored a depreciated currency, gold has left the country. Gold left France at the time she undertook this same experiment. Gold left England when she allowed irredeemable paper to be circulated, and she had to go back to the regular standard before she could get it back. Gold left Holland in the same way. Gold will leave any country where it is made to associate with rags that are irredeemable. You have legislated gold out of your country. Invite it back, and forty million people will get you all the gold you want. Then with paper issued by the Government of the United States, redeemable in the first instance by the banks, you will have a currency that is better than any you ever had before. You will have all the gold you need as a regulator, as a basis for your currency, and it will come very shortly. Then we shall have prosperity based upon a certainty. But do not let us go any further in the direction of repudiation; do not let us go any further in the direction of dishonesty; but let us come back to honesty now as we have the capacity and ability to do.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada refused, probably very correctly, to allow me to interrupt him in his speech to ask him a question. I proposed to ask him a very plain question, which would not have taken more than a moment to answer. He said that our currency was the reproach of the country. I wanted to know from the Senator where was the reproach. Was the issuing of our greenbacks, and afterward the establishment of our national banks, a reproach when it saved the country from the hand of the spoiler? Was it a reproach when this Government of ours, which I and other men believe the most beneficent Government in the world, was saved from destruction and the country from dismemberment? Was that a reproach? I think not. Without our banking system, without our greenbacks, we should have been severed long ago. The great consummation of the war, which destroyed so much capital and so many valuable lives, was saved to us and to the world and to future generations by the currency which the wisdom of Congress gave to the people. I think there was no reproach in that.

Then again the Senator said, what I do not believe is true, that it costs something to be honest. My teaching has always been that honesty is the best policy. In my judgment it is always profitable to be honest. The man who only looks for pecuniary profit is a fool, because he always suffers. Just and honest acts of individuals, and wise and just acts of legislators, always produce benefits, not only for those for whom they legislate, but for themselves. The man in this Senate who will protect the laborer and the producer will always receive honor and profit. He will derive no loss from that.

Mr. STEWART. Did I understand the Senator to ask me where the reproach was?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, sir; I will be more civil to him than he was to me.

Mr. STEWART. In time of need we made the promise; and I do not question the honesty of it, if you propose to discuss that question; but the reproach comes now, when we have got the ability to redeem that promise, that we will not do it. It is no reproach to a poor man to get into debt, but when he gets rich and is able to pay, then it is a reproach if he attempts to put his property out of his hands and go into bankruptcy to avoid paying his debt.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada, or any other man who owns a silver mine producing a million or two a year, can talk about the time having come; but the poor manufacturer in my State who builds railroad-cars, or who manufactures pig-iron, cannot afford to pay his honest debts just now. Neither can the farmer of my State, nor the farmer of Illinois, nor the cultivator of the soil anywhere.

The only man I am surprised at in this connection is my friend on my left, [Mr. GILBERT.] He, a man who has made his fortune by the increase of property purchased by his toil, is against us. Now, on this great question of the money-lenders against the money-borrowers—for that is the only question really before us—the men who have got fortunes beyond their wants, who can make money out of the necessities of the poor, are all against any increase of that life-giving article called currency in the country. The enterprising men everywhere, and the men who rely upon the enterprising men whether they have fortunes or not, are willing to do all they can to relieve the people; and I am surprised that a few Senators here, who owe all that they have, as I do, to their own toil and their own ability and their own industry, are now unwilling to give to those who are struggling as they have struggled the benefits of such a currency as will give life and prosperity to the business of the country.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I shall vote against reconsidering the vote taken yesterday, for two reasons: not because I like the measure adopted, but because it is indefinite; and because if we adopt anything else I am afraid we shall get something worse.

It seems to me that this is a most anomalous proceeding. I do not say that it is unparliamentary, but it is very near it. We are violating the customs of legislation. A bill is introduced by a committee. It is read once; it is read the second time; it is read the third time; it is put upon its passage. Every time we vote we feel the responsibility of our vote; we are making laws. What are we doing now? This is a very respectable debate, but the result amounts to nothing. Does any one ask me whether it is an unusual thing to give instructions to a committee? I say, yes. I say it is without any precedent in legislation, as far as I am informed and as I believe, on a complex, intricate question, where the legislative body is equally divided, in that state of things to instruct a committee how they shall perform their work.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. In view of that statement, I ask why it is that he wants to hold on to an instruction that was adopted by less than half the Senate, an inadvertent vote, when certainly one half the Senate did not vote at all? The Senator says he will vote against reconsidering it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will answer my friend. I will vote for any motion that is made to lay this whole subject on the table, as I have done. I will vote, after more votes are taken, for that motion at any time, or to recommit the bill without any instructions at all, at any time.

Mr. President, I think I have learned something by this debate. My impression is that I have gathered the sense of the Senate, and I shall be guilty of the temerity of stating it. I believe the average sense of the Senate is a bill something like this:

It shall provide in the first section, that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to accumulate gold from time to time, as the market will permit him, with a view at some time of resuming specie payments by the Government of the United States.

In the second section, that $70,000,000 be issued of additional national-bank-note currency for the accommodation of those States that have not their distributive share; that a like amount of greenbacks be retired; that the remaining $300,000,000 of greenbacks be rendered convertible and kept convertible by the Treasury of the United States.

I believe that is the average sense of the Senate, although it does not suit, perhaps, any one of us exactly; and I think that is about the point that we shall come to if we refer this subject to the committee.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, since the motion was made in the Senate to amend the motion made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] by instructing the committee, I have been hoping and waiting, being one of that committee which was to be instructed by the action of the Senate. I was rejoiced for a moment to suppose that the learning to which we had been listening for several weeks was likely to be condensed into instructions which the committee could follow, and I sat very docile, waiting for those instructions. When they finally came, the first thing that developed itself in the Senate was that the teacher quarreled over the lesson that had been given to the pupil, and the question was, what did the instructions mean? We went on for some time with this discussion, each Senator putting his own—on a motion to reconsider—interpretation upon the instructions which had already been given. Finally a motion came from the other Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] to lay the whole question upon the table; but the Senate holds on to the whole question, and we have it here yet.

Now, Mr. President, as a member of that committee, I rise for the purpose of seeing whether, after all this discussion and the refusal to lay upon the table, we cannot get back to the original proposition which the committee reported to the Senate. There are other measures pending upon which all the questions that have been raised upon this bill can be determined. They can be determined upon the resolution which was reported from the committee. They can be determined upon other bills which have been reported to the Senate. In my desire to see whether we can get back to the original bill, I have been induced to look up the origin of the section which gave rise to this bill which has been so prolific in suggesting other questions of finance to the Senate. Let us see how it got here, who introduced it, the discussion that occurred upon it, and whether there is this necessity for all these measures to be incorporated upon it, when the time has arrived which was predicted in the discussion for its enforcement.

Senate bill No. 378 of the Forty-first Congress, second session, came into the Senate, in the session of 1870, without the provision in it which has given rise to this bill, and after the discussion had progressed upon it some time, on the 26th of January, 1870, a notice was given, as follows, by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] I read from the Globe, second session Forty-first Congress, part 1, page 786:

Mr. MORTON. I desire to submit two amendments, or to give notice of them, that they may be considered by the Senate. In line 3 of the first section I desire to strike out "$45,000,000" and to insert "$52,000,000." It will take $52,000,000 to give $45,000,000 of actual circulation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that that amendment is now in order and will take precedence of the pending amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is to strike out the first two sections of the bill, and any amendment to perfect those sections is in order before the question is taken on striking them out.

I now read what follows by the Senator from Indiana, to show that he is the author of the bill to carry out which the pending bill was reported, and to show, moreover, that when he offered that proposition in the Senate, instead of asking for $25,000,000 to be distributed among the Southern and Western States, he was content with $13,000,000, and said that would be enough:

Mr. MORTON. Then I move to insert "$52,000,000" instead of "$45,000,000" in the third line of the first section, as it will take $52,000,000 to give $45,000,000 of actual circulation, the issue requiring $7,000,000 of greenbacks to be withdrawn. I shall further offer, as additional sections, two sections taken from the bill that passed the Senate last spring, providing for a redistribution of the currency, and amending them so that they will take but $13,000,000 from the States in excess, to be distributed to the States that have not their share; these $13,000,000 not to be taken, however, until the $52,000,000 provided for by the other amendment shall have been exhausted, providing that after the $52,000,000 provided by the first section have been exhausted, then $13,000,000 may be withdrawn from the States in excess, in accordance with the provisions contained in the amendment. This will make $65,000,000 provided for altogether, which I think will be sufficient for the wants of the West and the South.

That was on the 26th of January. The discussion proceeded, and upon several occasions, when the questions was before the Senate, the Senator from Indiana made remarks of a similar character. On the 27th he said:

My amendments only propose to take $13,000,000 from the Eastern States in excess, and these $13,000,000 are not to be taken until after the $52,000,000 provided for in the first section shall have been exhausted. Why, sir, if we do not exhaust the $52,000,000, and do not need any more, then not one dollar is taken from the Eastern States.

Again:

But the Senator from Kentucky seems unwilling to take $45,000,000 by way of taking up the 3 per cents, and wants $60,000,000 to be taken entirely from the East. Then what is he going to do with the $45,000,000 of 3 per cents? He admits, and so does the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] that the $45,000,000 ought to be taken up; that we are paying interest on currency when we ought not to do so; but they seem to be unwilling to get $45,000,000 for the West by taking up the $45,000,000 of 3 per cents, and insist upon redistribution to the actual amount of $60,000,000. I do not sympathize with that feeling at all. We ought to have $65,000,000, and I am perfectly willing to take forty-five or fifty-two millions of that amount, not by way of taking it from New England, but by way of taking up the 3 per cent. certificates; and then if we need $13,000,000 more we shall ask our friends in the East to give us from their abundance; and I think they ought to come forward unitedly and support this proposition.

Again, on page 817 of the same volume of the Globe, another phase of the subject came up; but before passing to that I wish to call attention to the fact, not for the purpose of suggesting to the Senator from Indiana that he occupies a different position now in opposing this bill from that which he occupied at the time that was under discussion, but to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have just arrived at the time when the necessity arises for the enforcement of this law, the $52,000,000 having just been taken up. We are at that point when we propose to redistribute $25,000,000, the point when the Senator from Indiana said, in 1870, $13,000,000 would be enough.

I now come to another point which has been developed in this discussion, and to show that we do not at all times take the same view of the effect of the same measure. That is very natural. It is no reproach, and I do not quote it as a reproach to the Senator from Indiana. But a few days ago my colleague offered an amendment for free banking, and one of the arguments to sustain that proposition was that it would retire so many of the greenbacks as a reserve as to bring our paper up to par. That was the argument. It would make it better. I trust I do not misstate it. I think it was contended both by my colleague and by the Senator from Indiana that it was a wise measure and that this would be the effect of it. Now, sir, in the course of that discussion—I read from page 817—the Senator from Indiana said this:

Now, what will be the effect if you retire all your legal-tenders? Will you thereby bring your national-bank notes nearer to par? No, sir; they will be farther from it; but I will tell you one change that will take place. When your legal-tender notes are all retired then gold becomes par. Gold is now at a premium and your legal-tender notes are the par; but when they are all gone then gold becomes the par and your national-bank notes are at a discount.

Mr. CAMERON. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. SCOTT. If my colleague will permit me to finish the quotation, I will then cheerfully hear the question he wishes to put. I am in the midst of a quotation; but I will hear the question now if he desires it.

Mr. CAMERON. O, no; I will wait.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Indiana proceeded:

You say now that your national-bank notes are at par. So they are; and you say that gold is at a premium of 20 per cent. as compared with them; but strike out the legal-tenders and gold becomes the par and your national-bank notes are worth seventy or seventy-five or eighty cents on the dollar, just as the case may be, and that is all you have accomplished by it. So far from the retiring of greenbacks being the means of bringing about specie payments, I have always looked upon it the other way: that greenbacks were to be the instrument by which specie payments were to be brought about.

That was my opinion a year ago; and it is my opinion now that when the Government brings its greenbacks up to par by any process, by fixing a future time to redeem them, or in some other way that may devised, the whole body of the currency will be at par along with the greenbacks, because the rest of the currency is redeemable in greenbacks.

I will now hear the question of my colleague.

Mr. CAMERON. My colleague was hardly just in his reference to my remarks, in which he said that my plan of a general banking law under the law of reserve would ultimately bring specie payments, and as I believed at a very early day. My colleague, of course unintentionally, misrepresents me by saying it would bring specie payments immediately. I do not want specie payment to-day, nor to-morrow, nor any other day until the country is ready for it; and that seems to be the difference between my colleague's argument and my own opinion. I want the country to rise up to the condition of gold payments. I do not think it is in that condition now. I think by the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, which is a mere emanation from the Committee on Finance, or following that, you would be compelled to pay specie immediately. By making the greenbacks redeemable in 5 per cent. bonds, you would bring them up to a greater value than the bonds themselves, and of course they would have to be redeemed at once. I have said repeatedly, and I am surprised that I have not been understood, that one of the great advantages to be obtained by my proposition is to have specie payments in a short time, not now. My desire is to relieve the industry of the country and to prevent a panic, which I believe has only been prevented thus far by the belief that Congress would do something to relieve the industry of the country.

Mr. SCOTT. My colleague misapprehended the tenor of my remarks entirely. I was not quoting him nor his project with reference to its effect as to the time when it would bring about specie payments, but I quoted his proposed amendment, showing the effect which I supposed he thought it would have in retiring the legal-tenders, for the purpose of showing that the argument of the Senator from Indiana in 1870 was, that if that were successful, then the national-bank notes would fall below par.

Now, on the subject of specie payments, while I do not wish to be diverted for the purpose of discussing that question, my colleague equally misapprehends my position. I am not only not in favor of the immediate resumption of specie payments, but I do not think it possible for us to resume specie payments immediately, nor at any time in the very near future. He and I, I think, agree on that subject. I go further, and say that after we have resumed, it is not possible that we should keep up that resumption during all time, and especially during panics.

Mr. CAMERON. Then I am glad to say that my colleague and myself agree in the same object, but differ in the mode by which it is to be produced.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, my purpose was to show that there ought to be no difficulty about enforcing the bill which we originally reported; that it was a bill that commanded the assent of the Senate; that it particularly commanded the assent of those who are now desirous of making this bill the medium of testing the sense of the Senate upon all possible questions.

Going further on in this discussion, I find that finally the Senator from Indiana, on page 944 of the same volume of the Globe, offered the amendment of which he gave notice, and which contained the amount of $13,000,000 for redistribution among the States that then had a deficiency, after having on several occasions stated his belief that $13,000,000 would be sufficient. That bill passed.

Upon following its history I find that its provisions were the subject of so much controversy between the Senate and the House that the first conference committee upon it was discharged and a second conference committee appointed, and upon that conference committee was the Senator from Indiana, and he was one of the two Senators who signed the conference report upon which the bill finally became a law. So that if there is any one to whom this bill ought to be acceptable, it ought to be acceptable to the Senator from Indiana, especially when it finally took the form of giving nearly 100 per cent. more of currency for redistribution among the Southern and Western States than he originally demanded, and said he believed it was sufficient.

Now, sir, having given this brief history of the bill, showing that the authorship of the provisions which we are now seeking to enforce came from the West, I ask, after this discussion has progressed for more than a week upon a single bill, after amendments have been voted upon testing the Senate upon a multitude of other questions, after the Senate has refused to lay that bill and the pending amendments on the table, is it reasonable to ask that this discussion shall go on ad libitum forever upon every phase of the financial question, when there will be abundance of time and opportunity to present every one of those questions in a practical form? Why can we not get back to this bill, and by a vote of the Senate determine it yea or nay? If there is a majority of the Senate against giving this $25,000,000, let us say so. If there is a majority for it, let us say so. It will not interfere with our subsequent legislation. No man here will feel himself trammeled by it. I shall not. If it be found that the West and South are entitled to more, I will not permit this to stand in the way; but I do think that we ought not to permit every other project that anybody sees proper to fasten upon this bill to stand in the way of getting the sense of the Senate upon it.

Now, Mr. President, I have said about all that I rose to say on this question. The pending question of instruction, as I have already said, I think it has been shown is inexpedient. I am not unwilling to be instructed; but if we are to renew the same kind of discussion that we have had for the last twelve hours in passing first an instruction and then getting into a wrangle over what the instruction means, I submit that the pupils who are to be instructed would be rather confused than enlightened.

I hope, sir, that we shall get back to the original bill, and get a vote upon it before we adjourn, and then in due process of time meet all these other questions when our views can have practical effect, when they shall be incorporated in a bill regulating this whole subject, if the committee shall ever be able to agree upon one.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I did not intend to say another word, but I must regard the speech of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] as a little extraordinary in several respects. His effort is to place me in an inconsistent position.

Mr. SCOTT. I did not mean that.

Mr. MORTON. If it did not mean that, I do not know exactly what it did mean. But I submit the remark that my friend has failed. What I said at that time was in consideration of the circumstances in which we were placed. I thought at that time, I have no doubt, (for I always express the thoughts I have at the time, and whenever I think they are wrong I do not hesitate to take them back or to express others,) that sixty-five millions of currency would be sufficient to meet the wants of the West and South. That was in January, 1870, before the census of 1870 was taken. When that census was taken, it showed that upon the basis of the act of 1865, in addition to the fifty-four millions of currency provided for in the act of 1870, it would require forty millions more to equalize the currency between the States. I read from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency:

> The final distribution of the $54,000,000 will still leave a deficiency of $40,000,000 in different States of the Union, which will require to be filled before the proportion among the several States will be equalized on the basis of wealth and population.

That was shown, the census of 1870 proving that the twenty-five millions came entirely short; and now, sir, four years after, four years of unprecedented growth and prosperity, the twenty-five millions, the forty millions, the sixty millions, come short of making that equalization; but of what I said and what the Senate voted in 1870, we are asked to be held to it. Why, Mr. President, I have had occasion to change my views with the changing circumstances and conditions by which I have been surrounded. Will my friend admit that he has not changed since that time; that he has learned nothing? I think not.

Mr. SCOTT. O, no; I cannot say that.

Mr. MORTON. I see Senators sitting around me who were in Congress in 1862, when the legal-tender act was passed authorizing the first legal-tender notes. They denounced it as unconstitutional and wicked, and one of them went so far as to say that these legal-tender notes, the greenbacks, would go out to the world as lepers and vagabonds upon the face of the earth, and that their issue would mark a carnival of fraud, a saturnalia of crime. Those Senators would not like to repeat those remarks in view of what has since happened. We have all been instructed by the events of the war.

But the inconsistency of which my friend accuses me is that I thought $65,000,000 were enough in January, 1870, and now I think it will require more than double that amount. I am satisfied that it will. If there is anything to be made by pursuing this line of remark, I presume that equal industry and research on my part, which I have not, would enable me to find that a number of Senators around me have had occasion to change their views on the subject of finance, have had occasion to change their theories as well as amounts and conditions to meet existing wants and conditions. I find no fault with them. When a man changes his theory from the convictions of his judgment, I give him credit for it; and so far as any change is concerned there, there is, I think, nothing that I need be ashamed of.

I have said all the time in this debate that I am for returning to specie payments. I thought in 1868 it was the time to begin, an infinitely better time than now, and I proposed my little plan; but that was not considered. Those who are now so anxious to have specie payment, if I remember correctly, were not then so much in favor of it; men who are anxious to resume upon a panic were not willing to begin then upon good times. They have changed their views. I find no fault with them; I accuse them of no inconsistency; if I had occasion to hunt up their records it is very likely that I could; but I see them all around me, and I remember what they said and what they did. I think it is the weakest of all arguments; I should hesitate now to assail their views in that way; but if any one thinks he can make a point on me in that way, he is certainly welcome to do it.

Mr. SCOTT. My friend seems to be unnecessarily sensitive on this point; for with all the disavowal that I could make of intending to quote this for the purpose of showing his inconsistency, he seems inclined to construe my remarks into somewhat of a personal nature against himself. Now, sir, I need not again repeat that I have said my object in quoting this was not to place the Senator in an inconsistent position, but to show that opposition should not come from him when the Finance Committee seek to give effect to a law of which he is the author; and that that opposition ought not to come in the form of all possible theories and plans that have no connection with giving effect to the amendment of which he was the author. Certainly the Senator cannot so far misapprehend my motives as to suppose that I could think a mere personal inconsistency would amount to an argument addressed to the Senate upon a question of this character. I have quoted it, as I have said, for the purpose of showing that this opposition ought not to come from that quarter, and that this bill, intended to give relief to the Senator's section, ought, as the time has arrived when the $25,000,000 provision ought to be given effect, to be passed without embarrassing it with the other amendments which have been offered here.

Mr. BOREMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays, and I give notice that I shall call for the yeas and nays on every proposition until this matter is disposed of.

Mr. BOREMAN. In answer to the Senator from Ohio, I would say that I deem it necessary to have a short executive session this evening. I do not make the motion in opposition to the bill, or to a vote. I am ready for a vote.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senate will agree to take the vote on this reconsideration, let us have it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am ready.

Mr. BOREMAN. If we can vote, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to have this matter disposed of.

Mr. BOREMAN. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair,) The question is on reconsidering the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COOPER, (when Mr. BROWNLOW's name was called.) My colleague is paired with the Senator from Maryland, Mr. HAMILTON. If my colleague were here he would vote "yea," and the Senator from Maryland would vote "nay."

Mr. FLANAGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, Mr. ALCORN. I suppose our pair includes this proposition. I presume he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, (when his name was called.) On this proposition I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. CARPENTER. If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, Mr. WRIGHT. I suppose he would vote "yea" if he were present, and I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY. On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. RANSOM. If he were here I presume he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Cameron, Clayton, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, and West—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hamlin, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Maine, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Sumner, and Wadleigh—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Brownlow, Carpenter, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas,

Ingalls, Lewis, Morrill of Vermont, Ransom, Saulsbury, Thurman, Windom, and Wright—20.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] to the instructions moved by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.]

Mr. BOREMAN. Now I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have this question determined.

Mr. BOREMAN. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the instructions proposed by the Senator from North Carolina as an amendment to the motion to recommit.

Mr. MORTON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the amendment on which we are now to vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add to the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance the following instruction:

And that the Committee on Finance be, and they are hereby, instructed to report, as soon as practicable, a bill providing for the increase of the national-bank circulation, so that the whole volume thereof shall not exceed $400,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLANAGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired off with the Senator from Mississippi, Mr. ALCORN. If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. CARPENTER. If present, he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. GORDON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, Mr. BAYARD. If he were here he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, Mr. INGALLS. If present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Iowa, Mr. WRIGHT. I am told he would vote "yea" if present;" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, Mr. RANSOM.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Cameron, Clayton, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Logan, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Robertson, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, and West—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hager, Hamlin, Jones, Kelly, Morrill of Maine, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Sumner, and Wadleigh—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Brownlow, Carpenter, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Ingalls, Lewis, Morrill of Vermont, Ransom, Saulsbury, Thurman, Windom, and Wright—20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on recommitting the bill, with the instructions just acted upon.

Mr. GORDON. I wish to offer an amendment to the instructions just adopted, by adding the following:

To be distributed among the States which have not their quota of currency, and to no others, and in the ratio of such deficiency on the basis of population and production.

["No!" "No!"]

If there is any discussion I will withdraw it. It is simply to distribute among the States that have not their quota.

Several SENATORS. Withdraw it.

Mr. GORDON. I withdraw it.

Mr. DAVIS. I have an amendment to propose, to add to the instructions already adopted the following:

Also for free banking under the present national banking law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Is that in addition to the proposition of the Senator from Georgia?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition of the Senator from Georgia is withdrawn.

Mr. DAVIS. It is to be added to the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOREMAN. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope not.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope we shall go into executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well; the yeas and nays have no terror for me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to be responsible for the continuance of the matter.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOREMAN. I hope this motion will be voted down. I desire an executive session for a short time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. On this question I shall venture to vote, because I do not suppose the pair with Mr. WRIGHT reaches to a question of adjournment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron, Fenton, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Johnston, Jones, McCreery, Pratt, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Stockton, and Sumner—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Buckingham, Chandler, Conover, Cooper, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Harvey, Howe, Kelly, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Tipton, and Wadleigh—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Brownlow, Carpenter, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Lewis, Ransom, Thurman, West, Windom, and Wright—24.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. SCHURZ. I desire to speak on the question of finance at length.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator would allow me, I should be delighted to hear anybody on finance at this time, especially my friend from Missouri; but if he will consent to postpone it to Monday, I will move an executive session.

Mr. SCHURZ. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BOREMAN] to proceed to the consideration of executive business, upon which there can be no debate.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. No. 780) requiring the United States marshals and clerks of the United States circuit and district courts who have received fees and emoluments in excess of their legal compensation, to deposit the same with the Treasurer of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 1273) to regulate proceedings in mandamus; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2084) to provide for the appointment of clerks for the circuit and district courts of the United States held at New Albany and Evansville, in the district of Indiana.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 20, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a brief personal explanation of not over five minutes, and I think not over three minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, in the course of debate on yesterday, I made some remarks which my colleague [Mr. CROSSLAND] thought reflected on him and did him injustice. As neither of us had the floor in our own right at the time, it was impossible for me to explain either to him or the House, what I now assure both was the fact, that I had not the slightest idea either of wounding his feelings or of reflecting on him in the slightest degree. I have too high a regard for him to do either. If in the heat and hurry of debate I did or said anything which either my colleague or any other person construed into any imputation on him as a gentleman or a Representative, I wish here and now to retract it.

I believe now that I made a mistake in referring at all to what took place between my colleague and myself some weeks ago, but I assure the House and the gentleman that I did not intend to do it in an offensive way. My only thought was, that as I had pointed out to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] the large increase of expenditures in the Post-Office Department, and the large deficiency asked, as shown by the Secretary of the Treasury, and he had not answered it quite satisfactorily, my colleague ought not to say anything which might help him out. With that view I tried to remind him that at or near the close of a very excellent speech which he made sometime ago, which in its general range referred to the statements of the Postmaster-General, I had called his attention to what the Secretary of the Treasury had said about post-office deficiencies. A desultory and somewhat confused debate sprang up, which I thought we both agreed threw no special light on the apparent difference between the two officials, and it was left out of the RECORD. I had not studied the question any more after that, and I did not suppose he had, and I wanted it to stand on Mr. KASSON'S replies. I think, on reflection, that I did my colleague injustice in the remark that our first little discussion was left out because he thought it would spoil his speech. I am inclined to think I made that remark to him. His speech was able and well-considered. I had listened to it all with pleasure and profit. I wanted to send a number of them to Kentucky, as I did. I know my feeling was that it would be unjust to my colleague to mix up with such a speech the ill-considered questions and answers which would be injected into it, especially when it came to be read at a distance. They had no necessary, if indeed even proper, relation to the broad subject he had discussed.

I regret exceedingly the occurrence of yesterday. I think, on reflection, that my colleague had cause to be hurt at my remarks, though I assure him I did not intend to hurt his feelings, misrepresent him, or do him injustice in any way. I have, perhaps, through very high personal regard for him, been in the habit of taking too many liberties with him, and speaking to him in ways that I would not if I liked him less. My appreciation of his character is so high that I always doubt my own recollection when he differs with me as to a fact. I thank the House for giving me, what is always a high privilege, the right to do justice to a friend and to myself, especially when the blame of whatever occurred rests on me, by alluding to matters which wounded the feelings of one I so sincerely esteem.

Mr. CROSSLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire a moment to say that I accept, I trust, in the same manly spirit in which my colleague tenders, the explanation of the unfortunate affair of yesterday. My colleague knows the high estimate in which I have always held him, both as a man and a statesman. I have sat at his feet to learn political wisdom, as Saul sat at the feet of Gamaliel, and I desire to assure him that the little affair has in no degree abated the warmth of my regard for him. I desire to offer an apology to the House for the excitement exhibited by me in my remarks of yesterday.

ILLINOIS AND MICHIGAN CANAL.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to present a memorial of the Legislature of Illinois, in relation to the extension of the Illinois and Michigan Canal from the Illinois to the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER. The memorial will be received, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Mr. DURHAM. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire the memorial to be read to the House.

The SPEAKER. It will be ordered to be printed and referred.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I wish to have it read to the House.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope there will be no objection. It is a memorial from the Legislature of the State of Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks when gentlemen present memorials which are ordered to be printed and referred, they ought not to ask that they be read, in that way taking up the time of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If the objection be insisted on, I do not insist; but I have never known, when the request was made to have a memorial from a State Legislature read at the Clerk's desk, it was ever refused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that in not one case in one hundred is it done.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It may not be done when there is no request made to have it read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no demand for the regular order of business the Chair does not object to the memorial being read, although it is of the utmost importance time should not be lost.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I make the request because it is common to make such a request, and I have never known the request to be refused by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair disagrees with the gentleman that the request is a common one.

Mr. DURHAM. I must insist on the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky insists on the regular order of business, and it is the duty of the Chair to enforce it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Because the gentleman from Kentucky does insist upon his objection, I ask that the memorial be printed, and referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals. But I must say that I never knew an objection insisted on in any case before, since I have been a member of the House, when such a memorial was asked to be read at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that memorials and resolutions of State Legislatures are always printed. That is a mark of respect to States sending memorials and resolutions here. And the Chair will again state that not once in a hundred instances is the request made that they be read.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask that the memorial be printed and referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

There was no objection; and the memorial was so referred.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. STORM. I rise to a privileged question. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the House will not act upon that motion without some consideration. I was about to invite the attention of the House——

Mr. STORM. I object to debate.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will allow me just a moment, I will say that I was about to propose that we should devote to-morrow to the consideration of the banking bill in Committee of the Whole—not as in Committee of the Whole, but in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee desires that to-morrow the bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency shall be considered in Committee of the Whole. He therefore antagonizes the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next. The motion is not debatable.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn over, there were—ayes 67, noes 83.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCOFIELD. The gentleman who has called the regular order yields to me to offer a resolution to obtain information from one of the Departments.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes occasion to remark that when a gentleman demands the regular order he thereby deprives himself of the right to yield for anything. A gentleman has no right to demand the regular order and then select an individual to whom he shall yield.

The regular order having been called, the morning hour begins at twenty-three minutes past twelve o'clock, and, this being Friday, committees will be called for reports of a private nature, the call resting with the Committee on Claims.

JAMES R. HAMBLEN.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2055) for the relief of James R. Hamblen, of Camden, Mississippi; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

R. W. CLARK.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, also, from the same committee, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 495 a bill (H. R. No. 2086) for the relief of R. W. Clark, postmaster at Brattleborough, Vermont; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

DR. EDWARD JARVIS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 302) for the relief of Dr. Edward Jarvis; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

OLIVER P. MASON.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 763) for the relief of Oliver P. Mason; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

JULIUS GRIESENBECK.

Mr. HAMILTON also, from the same committee reported a bill (H. R. No. 2087) for the relief of Julius Griesenbeck, of Waco, Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES LILLIE.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2088) for the relief of James Lillie, postmaster at Lisbonville, Ray County, Missouri, as a substitute for House bill No. 1177; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

C. W. C. DUNNINGTON.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 561) for the relief of C. W. C. Dunnington; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH B. ROTHSCHILD.

Mr. SHOEMAKER, of Pennsylvania, also, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of Joseph B. Rothschild, for relief for money stolen from collector's office at Findlay, Ohio; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM CHESTER.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 692) for the relief of William Chester; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

JOHN BRENNAN.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 650) for the relief of John Brennan; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

JAMES COATS.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 104) for the relief of James Coats, of Jackson, Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

LOUISA P. MOLLOY.

Mr. EDEN, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2089) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa P. Molloy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JACOB HARDING.

Mr. EDEN, from the same committee, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 2090) for the relief of Jacob Harding; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with a report accompanying the same, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM NORTHEDGE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2091) for the relief of the heirs and next kin of Colonel William Northedge, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the report accompanying the same, ordered to be printed.

JOHN W. DIVINE.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2092) for the relief of John W. Divine, late assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

PASSENGERS IN STEAMSHIPS AND OTHER VESSELS.

Mr. CONGER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1364) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855.

The bill provides that the thirteenth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, be, and the same is thereby, repealed; and that hereafter each and every collector of customs to whom shall be delivered the manifests or lists of passengers prescribed by the twelfth section of the act aforesaid, approved March 3, 1855, shall make returns from such manifests or lists of passengers to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in such manner as shall be prescribed by that officer, under whose direction statements of the same shall be prepared and published.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is that a private bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not, in the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. I ask permission to report it, although it is not strictly a private bill, because the committee have been requested so to do by the Treasury Department, in order that they might compile the statistics required by the bill for their forthcoming report.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Without having heard distinctly what the bill is, I hold that none but bills of a private nature should be reported at this time.

Mr. MAYNARD. If it is only desired to have it go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, I will not object.

Mr. CONGER. I ask its consideration now, because the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State have both in a printed letter recommended the passage of such a bill, in order that the statistics provided for may be prepared by the Bureau of Statistics for publication.

The SPEAKER. It would probably be more regular for the Chair to recognize the gentleman at the expiration of the morning hour to ask unanimous consent for this purpose; it would require unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. CONGER. Very well; I will withdraw the bill.

SCHOONER GEORGE WARREN.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, House bill 1365, to grant an American register to the Canadian schooner George Warren.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the Canadian schooner George Warren, owned by Benjamin F. Morton, of Detroit, Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. The facts in regard to this case are as follows: This schooner was condemned in the United States court of Michigan for a breach of the revenue laws, and was sold under that condemnation. At the time of the sale the deputy marshal of the United States, misunderstanding the law upon that subject, publicly proclaimed that the purchaser under that sale would be entitled to an American register. The purchaser bought with the express understanding, himself not being familiar with the law on that subject, that he would be entitled to an American register by virtue of the sale. That was not the law; but the committee recommend the passage of this bill, because the purchaser had been deceived by an officer of the Government in a statement which affected the purchase.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARINE HOSPITAL, DETROIT, MICHIGAN.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with the recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1706) to authorize the running of Wright street through the grounds of the United States Armory Hospital, at Detroit, Michigan; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

CANCELING HAND-STAMPS, ETC.

Mr. PACKER, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1789) referring to the Court of Claims for adjudication and determination the claims of the parties therein named for the past and the future use of the Norton post-marking and canceling hand-stamp, and the Robertson improved hand-stamp; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

PETER S. PATTON.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 753) for the relief of Peter S. Patton; and moved that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

MICHAEL COLOTZ.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the petition of Michael Colotz, asking to be placed on the pension-roll; and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN JAMES W. ATKINSON.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely upon the petition of Captan James W. Atkinson, for reimbursement for recruiting expenses; and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MATTHEW WOODRUFF.

Mr. DONNAN. The Committee on Military Affairs have directed me to report back the bill (S. No. 365) for the relief of Matthew Woodruff, late first sergeant of Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Volunteers, and to move that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. This bill is substantially the same as House bill No. 1777, which is now before the Committee of the Whole, and we shall ask that this Senate bill be substituted for the House bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

EPHRAIM W. DAVIS.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the petition of Ephraim W. Davis, late a private of the Fifty-fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers, asking Congress to authorize the payment of back pension; and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

GENERAL SAMUEL W. CRAWFORD.

Mr. ALBRIGHT also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2093) for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, United States Army; which was read a first and second time, and, with a written report, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM A. SNODGRASS.

Mr. ALBRIGHT also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2094) for the relief of William A. Snodgrass, late lieutenant of Company H, Thirty-ninth Regiment of Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, and with a written report, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES W. BOWEN.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, reported back, from the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill (H. R. No. 1207) for the relief of James W. Bowen, late provost-marshal of the tenth congressional district of Pennsylvania; and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

OFFICERS OF THE UNITED STATES RAM LANCASTER.

Mr. SCOFIELD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported adversely upon the memorial of the officers of the United States ram Lancaster, for bounty money; and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN HOLROYD.

Mr. SCOFIELD also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1816) for the payment of John Holroyd for the use of his patent and invention by the Government; and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL ASYLUM AT PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order for me to present, by order of the Committee on Naval Affairs, a resolution asking for information from one of the Departments?

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it will be in order. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. SCOFIELD. By instruction of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I ask consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas, in pursuance of an act of Congress, passed in the year 1811, a commission, consisting of the Secretaries of the Navy, Treasury, and War, was constituted and authorized to provide a permanent naval asylum for destitute and decrepit Navy officers, seamen, and marines; and whereas, in pursuance of said authority, the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia was established; and whereas the said city now entirely surrounds said asylum, and the site has therefore become entirely unsuitable for such asylum; and whereas the health and comfort of the brave men who imperiled their lives for their country would be highly promoted by a removal of said asylum to Annapolis, where the locality, scenery, and surroundings pre-eminently fit it as a site for said institution; and whereas the sale of said asylum would be a means of great economy, as said buildings and grounds are very valuable, and from the funds thereof suitable buildings could be erected at Annapolis and leave a large balance for the Treasury: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House of the propriety of a sale of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, and the erection of suitable buildings on the grounds adjacent to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, belonging to the Government, for the purposes of a naval asylum; and also to communicate any information he may have on the subject.

Mr. MYERS. I understand that is merely for the purpose of inquiry.

Mr. ARCHER. That is all.

Mr. MYERS. Then there is no objection to it.

Mr. RANDALL. My understanding is, it is only for information.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is all.

The resolution was adopted.

UNITED STATES STEAMER BIENVILLE.

Mr. LAMISON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1201) authorizing the payment of prize-money to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Bienville, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MARY C. BELL.

Mr. LAMISON also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2094½) granting an increase of pension to Mary C. Bell; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. LAMISON. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RUSK. That is a bill granting a pension, and ought to go to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this belongs to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and if there be no objection it will be referred to that committee.

Mr. LAMISON. These bills come to our committee, as they pertain to the naval service; and as these pensions are paid out of the naval-pension fund, it is believed they belong to our committee.

Mr. RUSK. It has been customary to have these bills referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I rise to a point of order. Has the Speaker the power to refer that bill to another committee when it is reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand it to be objected to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to assent to its reference to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. LAMISON. No, sir; I object.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would be glad if the House would give the committee instruction on that point. I have always claimed myself that all these bills should go to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The Committee on Naval Affairs has been divided on the subject, but there has always been a majority of the committee who would vote to retain these matters to act on them. We have a number of that kind before the committee now. If we get instructfons from the House we shall know how to act hereafter.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio who reports the bill, that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to refer the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole takes precedence of a motion to refer to a standing committee. The Chair supposed gentlemen assented to the bill going to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The question was taken, and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

MARY SWIFT.

Mr. LAMISON also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 52) granting an annuity to Mary Swift, daughter of Thomas Truxton, deceased, late commodore in the United States Navy, with the recommendation that it do pass, and moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RUSK. The same bill is before the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I see no reason why this Committee on Naval Affairs should report pension bills any more than the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL. It came from the Committee on Naval Affairs during the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows no reason why a naval pension should be considered by the Naval Committee any more than an Army pension should be considered by the Military Committee.

Mr. ARCHER. I think there is this reason for it: The naval-pension fund is a separate and distinct fund. It is kept for that purpose, and the interest each year is applied to the payment of its pensions. I think if any committee of this House can properly take cognizance of the naval-pension fund it is the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. It is a matter wholly, as the Chair has before remarked, within the discretion of the House to decide, with the facts before it, to what committee this bill shall be referred.

Mr. RUSK. This fund is under the control and is disbursed by the Commissioner of Pensions the same as any other pension fund.

Mr. ARCHER. No, sir; not by the Commissioner of Pensions, but by separate appropriations made every year for that purpose. Congress cut it down to 3 per cent. from 6 per cent., which it used to be. There is interest enough now to pay all naval pensions. We have given up in almost every instance to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I myself have referred bills of this nature to that committee because of the general understanding of the House that they should go there. But I have always thought that such claims should go to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I have had two or three small claims of this nature referred to them and we have considered them. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. RUSK] will not insist on this bill going to his committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say a word to the House in reference to this bill. I introduced it in the last Congress. It passed the House on the recommendation of the Naval Committee, granting fifty dollars per month to this lady. It went over to the Senate, but the Senator from Pennsylvania who had charge of it there did not succeed in calling it up. I do not object at all to any committee considering it. But I object to having this bill committed to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, on account of the delay that will be thereby caused. This is an old widow lady, approaching eighty years of age. In the course of human events her life is not likely to last very much longer, and I desire that in her declining years she shall have the advantage of this pension. The Secretary of the Navy addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, my colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] a letter on this subject, which I should like to have the House hear read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I suppose that the motion to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar is not withdrawn.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to that. I only object to its being sent to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The bill would necessarily have to go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, no matter from which committee it was reported.

Mr. RUSK. I will not object further to the bill going to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. I will reserve the letter of which I have spoken till the bill comes up for consideration on its merits.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

OLIVE S. BREED.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 814) granting a pension to Olive S. Breed; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ANN CRANE.

Mr. WALLACE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 280) granting a pension to Ann Crane; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

JOHN C. FARNAM.

Mr. SMALL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 240) granting a pension to John C. Farnam; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

GILMON BENNETT.

Mr. SMALL also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 493) granting a pension to Gilmon Bennett; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. SMALL also, from the same committee, reported adversely on the following petitions; and the same were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The petition of Mary A. Chute, for a pension;
The petition of Caroline P. Gerrish;
The petition of Clarissa D. Swain;
The petition of Caroline E. Thomas;
The petition of Henry M. Fyfe; and
The petition of W. P. Bartlett.

MRS. PENELOPE C. BROWN.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 330) granting a pension to Mrs. Penelope C. Brown, of Tennessee, widow of Stephen C. Brown, late a private of Company C, Eighth Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MRS. MARTHA E. BRIXEY.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 335) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha E. Brixey, of Tennessee; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MRS. SALLIE OATLEY.

Mr. YOUNG, of Kentucky, also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 375) granting a pension to Mrs. Sallie Oatley, of Lansing, Michigan; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHARLES MACARTHY.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2095) granting a pension to Charles Macarthy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SOPHRONIA AUSTIN.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2097) granting a pension to Sophronia Austin, of Linn County, Iowa; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES ROACH.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2096) granting a pension to James Roach; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. NANCY PARKHURST.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2098) granting a pension to Mrs. Nancy Parkhurst; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

OLIVER C. DENSLOW.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 360) granting a pension to Oliver C. Denslow; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MRS. ELIZABETH COPELAND.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2099) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Copeland; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS ON PETITIONS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN also, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of Charles Fitchett, of Fredericksburgh, Virginia, and the petition of Sarah Shackelford; and the same were laid upon the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed.

HOFF, DOERR, AND GEBHART.

Mr. WELLS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2100) for the relief of Martin Hoff, Casper Doerr, and George Gebhart, citizens of Saint Louis; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

STEAMER CLARA DOLSEN.

Mr. HANCOCK, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2101) for the relief of the owners of the steamer Clara Dolsen; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The committees have been called through for reports of a private nature.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LAMAR. I desire consent of the House to make a personal explanation, which will occupy but a few minutes. I ask the Clerk to read, from the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TODD] on the Arkansas election case, that portion which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the Committee on Elections there was no disagreement in regard to Judge WILSHIRE's right in the prima facie case.

Mr. LAMAR. I wish to say in behalf of my colleagues of the minority of the committee that that statement is absolutely incorrect, and the reverse of what actually occurred in the committee. It is only a question of recollection, and I desire to correct the statement.

Mr. TODD. Whatever statement I made in addressing the House the other day, I certainly had no intention to misrepresent the position of any member of the Committee on Elections. I made the statement, as I understood it to be, in strict and perfect accordance with the facts as developed in the committee. I came to that conclusion because of what had transpired there and from the fact——

Mr. MAYNARD. I shall feel obliged to interpose an objection to any statement of what occurred in the committee-room, for very obvious reasons.

Mr. LAMAR. Allow me to make a suggestion. This matter has been brought up and has gone so far, that unless a full and free explanation is made some injustice might be done. I have no doubt about the correctness of the position of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I am perfectly willing that, inasmuch as the committee have been put upon the record in the manner stated, so much shall be said as will prevent any injustice being done to anybody.

Mr. LAMAR. It has already been disclosed, or at least reference has been made to it. But we are now not going to show what occurred, but what did not occur.

Mr. MAYNARD. My point of order, which the Chair will take at once, is that the discussions and the action of the committee in their room are not legitimate or proper subjects for discussion or disclosure outside of the committee-room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. TODD. The gentleman need not be uneasy upon that point. It is not my purpose to disclose anything that took place in the committee-room; therefore the objection of the gentleman is likely unnecessary. What I desire to call attention to is what has been brought to the attention of the House, not by myself, but by another member of the Committee on Elections. If the House will refer to what I did say on that occasion they will see the position I assumed. My statement was substantially this: that there was no disagreement in the committee upon the prima facie right of Judge WILSHIRE to a seat; but that there were certain members of the committee who refused to concur in the resolution then pending before the House, because certain facts had been developed in the examination of the prima facie case which led them to doubt that Judge WILSHIRE was entitled to the seat upon the merits of the case. The statement I made, the impression created upon my mind by what occurred in the committee, is fully sustained by a resolution which was read as a portion of the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. THOMAS.] It reads thus:

Whilst the majority of the committee are of the opinion that upon the evidence to which they are legally restricted, Mr. W. W. WILSHIRE is prima facie entitled to be admitted as the sitting member of the House, pending the contest, yet the doubts arising from that evidence, in relation to his election, are so grave, that the committee asks the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections are restricted to investigate and determine the said case on its merits, and report the result to this House.

That resolution undoubtedly states the fact that a majority of the Committee on Elections thought they were legally restricted to the prima facie case. And it appears from the face of this resolution that there was at that time no objection made to the fact that Mr. WILSHIRE was entitled to the seat on the prima facie case. But the desire on the part of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] and his democratic colleagues on the committee was to evade the decision of the prima facie case, and to have the case decided upon its merits. If I have placed a wrong interpretation upon this resolution, it is to be attributed to my mental incapacity to comprehend its exact scope and meaning.

All that I desire to say is, that it is unfortunate that the gentleman did not correct the misstatement at the time it was made, instead of allowing a day or two to pass by; for he did say during the course of that discussion, as reported in the proceedings:

I do not desire to detain the committee in vindication of the positions which the minority have assumed in the report and the resolution which they have submitted to this House. I may, before the conclusion of the debate, correct some of the mistakes of fact into which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TODD] has fallen as to what transpired in the committee.

Of course, as I said at the outset, I do not desire to state any fact that is not clearly a fact; and if the gentleman denies my statement and asserts that he was opposed to a recognition of the prima facie case, I am of course bound to take that assertion and recognize it as his position.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, I have stated that, with my two colleagues signing the minority report, I was opposed to recognizing the prima facie right of Mr. WILSHIRE, and we so expressed ourselves in committee. With the gentleman's interpretation of that resolution I have nothing to do. I think it puts him in this attitude: From a resolution which recites that a majority believed that Mr. WILSHIRE had the prima facie right he draws the inference that there was unanimity in favor of it. He states that inference as a fact, and when corrected persists in his statement. All I have to add is that I presume the House is now satisfied of the imperturbability of my temper and the incorrigibility of the gentleman's convictions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar; and pending that motion I move that all general debate on the several bills be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that cannot be done.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It is the same order that was made a week ago.

The SPEAKER. It was made by unanimous consent.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Is there objection now?

Mr. HOLMAN. Must not this order be confined to a particular subject-matter, and not include the whole business before the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The House is competent, by general consent, to make the order refer to a single bill or to all the bills on the Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] object to the making of the same order which was made a week ago?

Mr. HOLMAN. Such an order may interfere with the object of the House in going into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I think the gentleman from Indiana does not understand the effect of my motion. It is not that general debate upon all the bills shall be terminated in ten minutes, but that upon each bill the general debate shall be limited to ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood the motion.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I think the gentleman from Indiana did not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY,] chairman of the Committee on Claims, requests that when the House shall go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, general debate on each bill be limited to ten minutes, leaving the five-minute debate upon amendments. This order requires unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. I object to it as applying to all bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why should some gentlemen in Committee of the Whole be allowed to make ten-minute speeches, while others are limited to five minutes?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I would be glad to limit all debate in Committee of the Whole to five minutes absolutely. If there be no objection I will ask that such an order be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] objects.

Mr. PACKER. Pending the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, I desire to say that very many gentlemen on the floor are desirous of continuing the consideration of the special order, House bill No. 825, with reference to the distribution of documents, seeds, &c. In accordance with their wish, and for the purpose of testing the sense of the House, I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Illinois by substituting a motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill I have just named.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done; it would not be in order. The special order to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKARD] has referred will come up five minutes hence. Should the House refuse to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, it will leave the House in consideration of the bill for the distribution of documents. But that would be interrupted at the hour of two o'clock, as would the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, by business relating to the District of Columbia, this being the third Friday of the month, on which the Committee on the District of Columbia are entitled to the floor after two o'clock.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope the House will indulge me in saying a word. By looking at the Private Calendar, it will be seen that over fifty private bills have been referred to the committee prior to this morning; and probably fifty more have been referred to-day. When we last went into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, we did not dispose, I think, of more than five bills. Thus far we have given but one day in each week to the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. Unless we proceed with the Private Calendar on every private-bill day, we shall not, I think, give proper attention to this business. I hope the House will uniformly go into Committee of the Whole on Fridays and Saturdays. It is very important that we should hold a session to-morrow for this business, as I hope the House will do not only this week, but every week; otherwise business of a private character will have no consideration whatever.

Mr. PACKER. Perhaps we may arrive at some accommodation on this question. The Committee on the District of Columbia, as the Chair has stated, will be entitled to the floor at two o'clock, so that after the arrival of the hour fixed for the consideration of the postal bill, we shall have half an hour for its consideration. In that time the gentleman who has the floor might possibly finish his remarks. After the Committee on the District of Columbia has reported its business—and I understand that they have not many reports to make—we could then go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and in that way the business of the Private Calendar would consume the remaining portion of the day. I think to-morrow morning we might be able to finish the bill reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in a short time.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I understand by referring to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, that the business from that committee will not occupy more than one hour to-day, so that the remaining portion of the time can be given to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. I hope that will be done.

The SPEAKER. The pending motion made by the gentleman from Illinois is that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 28.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. ORTH in the chair.)

WILLIAM H. PILKINTON.

The first bill taken up for consideration was a bill (H. R. No. 1587) for the relief of William H. Pilkinton, late a second lieutenant in Company G, Fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of War shall be, and he is thereby, authorized and directed to place the name of William H. Pilkinton on the rolls as second lieutenant in Company G, Fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, as of the date of June 30, 1864; and that the proper accounting and pay officers shall allow and pay to said Pilkinton the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant from said date until the date of his discharge, deducting any sum or sums he may have received on account of military service during said period.

Mr. PHILLIPS. There are mistakes in this bill which I move to correct. I move to insert the word "cavalry" after the word "regiment" where it occurs, and to insert the letter "e" in place of "i," in the word "Pilkinton" so that the bill will read as follows:

A bill for the relief of William H. Pilkenton, late a second lieutenant in Company G, Fifth Regiment Cavalry, Indiana Volunteers.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of William H. Pilkenton on the rolls as second lieutenant in Company G, Fifth Regiment Cavalry, Indiana Volunteers, as of the date of June 30, 1864; and that the proper accounting and pay officers shall allow and pay to said Pilkenton the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant from said date until the date of his discharge, deducting any sum or sums he may have received on account of military service during said period.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report be read.

It appears from the report, which was read, that the proof shows that William H. Pilkenton enlisted as a private soldier of Company G, of the Fifth Regiment of Indiana Cavalry, on the 18th day of August, in the year 1862, and was promoted to the office of second lieutenant of said company, receiving his commission as such on the 30th day of June, 1864; and upon the next day, under orders from the colonel of the regiment, entered upon the duties of second lieutenant. At this time the first lieutenant of the company, Samuel A. Armstrong, was promoted and commissioned to the captaincy, and the second lieutenant, J. S. Chittenden, was promoted and commissioned as first lieutenant. On or about the 1st of July, 1864, said Armstrong deserted, before he was mustered as captain. Application was at once made by the colonel of the regiment to have him dismissed from the service, but before this was done the colonel of the regiment was captured, and Lieutenant Chittenden, who was awaiting the dismissal of Armstrong to be mustered as first lieutenant, was also captured, leaving Pilkenton, still not mustered as second lieutenant, but in command of the company, which command he held till in the month of May, 1865, when Lieutenant Chittenden, having been exchanged, returned to the company.

On the 13th day of March, 1865, Armstrong, the deserting first lieutenant, was dismissed, and after the return of Chittenden in May he was mustered in as first lieutenant, and Pilkenton as second lieutenant, to date from the 13th of March, 1865.

Pilkenton now applies to have his muster dated as of the 1st of July, 1864, and to be paid accordingly; this application having been refused at the time of muster and since by the Secretary of War.

His case is a meritorious one; the testimony shows him to have been a good and faithful officer, and to have discharged the duties of a lieutenant in command of his company during the whole time named. The committee think that he should be put on the rolls and paid accordingly.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM SWANZEY.

The next business on the Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. ——) granting a pension to William Swanzey.

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Chairman, there was an application pending before the Commissioner of Pensions to grant a pension to this person, William Swanzey. The Committee on Invalid Pensions examined the case, and were unanimously of the opinion the application should be allowed by the Commissioner. He has considered the case, and, as he informed me, has allowed it. Therefore it is unnecessary this bill should be acted upon now. I move it be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY SAVAGE.

The next business on the Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1589) for the relief of Henry Savage, acting chargé d'affaires of the United States in Guatemala from May 7, 1856, to September 14, 1858.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is thereby, directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Henry Savage the sum of $3,538, being the amount due him for his services and expenses as acting chargé d'affaires for the United States at Guatemala from May 7, 1856, to September 14, 1858, inclusive, at the rate of $1,500 a year, which payment shall be in full discharge of all his claims for expenses and services rendered in that capacity.

It appears from the report that Mr. Henry Savage is a citizen of the United States, now and for many years past a resident in Guatemala. At various times between the 6th of February, 1830, and the 14th of September, 1858, in the absence of any accredited diplomatic representative of the United States in that country, the records, archives, and public property of the United States therein were committed to his custody, he corresponded with and received communications from the Department of State, and generally attended to the interests of the United States and its citizens there. The services were valuable, and Mr. Marcy, when Secretary of State, certified that they ought to be paid for, not at the rate of full salary of a chargé d'affaires but at the rate of fifteen hundred to two thousand dollars a year. Mr. Savage, during the various times in which he rendered these services, amounting in the whole to about eighteen years, gave up a large part of his house to the keeping of the records and archives of the legation, and to the transaction of the public business thereof. He also paid some money for the relief of destitute American seamen, postage on Government correspondence, &c.

On the 30th of October, 1855, Mr. Savage brought a suit in the Court of Claims against the United States, to recover the compensation due to him up to that time, and afterward recovered judgment therein for fourteen years and five months of service, at the rate of $1,500 a year, amounting to $21,625.

While this suit was pending he was again employed in rendering similar and equally valuable services from May 7, 1856, to September 14, 1858, inclusive, for which the minister to Guatemala vouches, as shown by the records of the legation, and which the Department of State has certified to be deserving of like compensation.

The time during which the suit in the Court of Claims was pending, and the time during which Mr. Savage was presenting his claim for compensation for the additional service to the Treasury and the State Departments without definite action thereon, extended until the limitation against a further suit in the Court of Claims attached. The justice and reasonableness of his claim were not denied, but no appropriation was found from which it could be paid. He therefore appeals to Congress; and the committee, finding on examination that he is equitably entitled to relief, report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a very old claim for services rendered to the Government by a foreign agent. I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts will explain more fully than is done by this report the reason for the extraordinary delay in adjusting compensation if the service were rendered by virtue of any request on the part of the Government. If these services were voluntarily rendered at this place, I cannot see how he is entitled to compensation. I hope the gentleman will explain the matter.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I will state, Mr. Chairman, I think the report gives the whole material for the House to come to a conclusion on it. I hardly think the gentleman from Indiana, who makes the suggestion, has noticed fully the extent of the statement in the report. The post of minister to Guatemala was found for a great series of years one in which it was very difficult to keep a minister. The climate was exceedingly unhealthy. Ministers were appointed, went out there, became sick, and had to return. In the mean time the diplomatic connection of our Government with that of Guatemala had to be preserved. There was a citizen of the United States residing there to whom in this instance the minister turned over the papers of the legation, requesting him to attend to the business of the country as its minister. He gave up his house substantially to it, preserving the papers and conducting the correspondence, and was so far recognized without a formal appointment by the State Department. Each successive Secretary of State recognized his services as valuable and as entitling him to compensation, besides expenditures of money that he made on behalf of destitute American seamen, &c.

After this had gone on a good many years he sent his bill to this country to obtain payment. It was presented to the State Department. They thought it a proper one, but had no funds out of which to pay it. The Court of Claims at that time was established, and he presented his claim, up to that time, to the Court of Claims. And upon the evidence of the State Department and on the facts I have mentioned the Court of Claims rendered a judgment in his favor, up to the time when he presented his petition, and the United States paid it.

Mean time he went on just in the same way while this suit was pending in the Court of Claims, and continued to render at a subsequent period services of precisely the same character and value. But the length of time during which his case was pending in the Court of Claims, and until he got information of the result, prevented his making another application, or bringing another suit there. After that judgment was rendered he presented his claim for the additional period, and the State Department recognized it and approved of it. It went from them to the Treasury Department, and lay there until the time had lapsed within which he could bring suit in the Court of Claims for this additional sum. There is nothing but that limitation that stands in the way of this payment to a person employed by the United States entitled to compensation, which has been ascertained judicially, as well as recognized by the Executive Departments, and for which he recovered compensation up to a certain date; and having gone on two years more in the same service, he now brings his bill to Congress, because, while the Department approved of his claim, it had no appropriation out of which to pay him, and he is obliged to come to Congress.

I may remark, also, that he has the misfortune to have been a loser by the way in which he prosecuted his claim before the Court of Claims. He presented his petition for compensation only up to a certain time; and they allowed not for the whole time, but within two years of it. But the committee were of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Claims covered his preceding claim up to the time of presenting it in the court; and therefore we have only reported an allowance to him of what he was entitled to as reasonable compensation at the same rate for the work he has continued to do. It is exactly as if a person employed in any other business had sued his employer for compensation for a certain amount of service, had brought an amicable suit, so to speak, and had it ascertained that he was entitled to compensation, and while the suit was going on had continued to render the same service in the same kind of employment, and when the suit was over asked the additional compensation for the additional time. That is all there is in this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. I had supposed that this was the case of a claim for compensation for services rendered while a person appointed regularly by the Government was at the same time receiving a salary for these very services.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Not at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. My recollection was that that was a portion of the history of this claim.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I do not so understand it. I understand that this is for services rendered during the intervals between the appointments of successive ministers who went out to Guatemala. The papers annexed to the petitions show that to be the fact. In the first instance the accredited representative of the United States had to leave on account of bad health; and it was only from that time that this man claimed any compensation.

Mr. HOLMAN. In that state of facts it would seem to me that this should be allowed. My impression always has been, when this subject was before the House heretofore, that there was a minister at Guatemala during all this period. If the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct, my impression in regard to the nature of this claim is wrong.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. This claim has not previously been before the House. It was the preceding claim, on which the Court of Claims gave a favorable judgment, and Congress appropriated the money.

The bill was laid aside to be favorably reported to the House.

JAMES DE LONG.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 526) for the relief of James De Long.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to James De Long, late consul at Aux Cayes, Hayti, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,816; $1,166 of the sum so appropriated being for money advanced and expended by the said James De Long, consul as aforesaid, for the relief of destitute colored emigrants, colonized under authority of the acts of April 16 and July 17, 1862, and $1,650 of the said amount being for extraordinary expenses incurred by him at the siege of Aux Cayes, Hayti, during his consulship at said place.

Mr. MYERS. This is a bill which passed both Houses during last Congress, but was not presented to the President in time to receive his signature. It has been reported again unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. There is a report accompanying it which is of some length, and I suppose it will not be necessary to have it read. I presume the facts of the case are generally understood in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the report should be read. It will put the House in possession of the facts better than any explanation can do.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, but before concluding,

The SPEAKER resumed the chair and said: The hour of two o'clock having arrived, this being the third Friday of the month, the Committee on the District of Columbia, under the rule, is entitled to the floor to report business from that committee.

CHIEF JUSTICE MORRISON D. WAITE.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I am about to move that the House now take a recess for ten minutes. I understand that the gentleman appointed and commissioned as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States is now in the Hall, and that it will be agreeable to members to have an opportunity to be presented to him and to make his acquaintance. For that purpose I move that the House now take a recess for ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House to take a recess for ten minutes for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The motion was agreed to unanimously.

The House accordingly took a recess, and the Speaker, leaving his chair, presented the members of the House to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The recess having expired, the Speaker resumed the chair and called the House to order.

ACCOUNTANT FOR THE DISTRICT COMMITTEE.

Mr. HALE, of New York. By instruction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I report the following resolution:

Be it resolved, That the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 13, 1873, authorizing the Committee on the District of Columbia to employ an accountant, &c., and directing him to be paid for his services out of the contingent fund, be amended so as to authorize the payment to be made from the appropriation for committee clerks of the House.

The resolution authorizing the employment of an accountant by the Committee on the District of Columbia provided for his payment out of the contingent fund of the House. The chairman of the Committee on Accounts [Mr. BUFFINTON] and the disbursing clerk of the House have called my attention to the fact that such payment is prohibited by law; but they both agree that the payment can be properly made out of the fund for the payment of committee clerks.

The resolution was adopted.

INCORPORATION OF A STREET RAILWAY.

Mr. HALE, of New York, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2102) to incorporate the Capitol, North O street, and South Washington Railway; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. COX. With the consent of the gentleman who reported this bill, I will raise the point of order that it should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole, because it appropriates property in which the Government has an interest for the benefit of this railway.

Mr. NEGLEY. I think that point is well taken.

Mr. HALE, of New York. With all deference, it seems to me that the point of order is not well taken. This bill does not make an appropriation of either money or property. It merely allows a street railroad to be laid down in the public streets of this city; or, in other words, it directs a new public use of property already dedicated to public use. It is a mere change to a certain extent of the use of property already dedicated to public use. That was the view of the committee, and I think it is a sound view.

Mr. COX. I would ask the gentleman whether, as a lawyer, the fee of the property of the streets of Washington is not in the Government of the United States?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I understand it is.

Mr. COX. And this bill dedicates the streets of which the Government owns the fee to a specific purpose?

Mr. HALE, of New York. The Government owns the fee of the streets in Washington, as I understand, but already subject to a dedication to a public use which is full and complete. This bill merely authorizes a different public use under that same dedication; but the whole property is already dedicated to a public use.

Mr. COX. The Supreme Court has held that the Government could take possession of any of these streets and shut them up.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SPEER. Does the gentleman hold that the dedication of these streets to the uses of a railroad company is a dedication to a public use?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. SPEER. A railroad company of private incorporation named in this bill?

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I would suggest that this is not anything more or less than it would be to permit a lecturer to use the Hall of the House of Representatives. It is a simple permission that certain streets may be used for a certain purpose until the United States shall otherwise order. It does not put them out of the power of the United States at all.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] has restated my point, of course better than I can state it. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER,] whether permission to a street railroad company to lay down a track in the public streets is a public use of those streets, I will say that I did not suppose that any lawyer on this floor had any doubt upon that point. It is upon that theory alone that railroads are permitted all over the country to take possession of highways and of private property for the uses of railroads.

Mr. SPEER. A highway dedicated to a public purpose without compensation for passing over it would be a dedication for a public use. But a dedication of a public street to a corporation which is allowed to tax the people for the privilege of riding in their cars along those streets, it seems to me is not, in my opinion, a dedication to a public use, but to the use of the private incorporators of that railroad company.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court of the United States, and the supreme court of every State of the Union, has held the law to be different from what has been stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to be very strict in his construction upon all questions of this kind; but he does not think this bill is liable to the point of order; for he does not see that even by any germane amendment it could dispose of public property. If the bill were subject to any germane amendment which would appropriate property of the Government, the Chair would send it to the Committee of the Whole; but the mere grant of the use of a public highway, which may at any time be taken back, is not, in the opinion of the Chair, an appropriation of either property or money.

Mr. COX. Suppose that an amendment should be offered to give these companies a part of the public grounds.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would rule such an amendment to be not germane.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Suppose there was a proposition to grant the right of way through the public lands.

The SPEAKER. The public lands are not dedicated as highways.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Their use as public highways may be authorized by act of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The streets and avenues of this District are now laid out as public highways.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. They are used as public highways by the consent of the Government. Just so by the assent of the Government the public lands out West might be used as public highways; but it would require an act of Congress to authorize it.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but by such an act property, the title of which is now vested in the Government and which is not devoted to any public use, would be given afresh to this particular purpose. But here we have public avenues or streets on which citizens may drive their wheeled carriages or other vehicles; and this bill proposes simply to authorize a company to use its wheeled carriages on these public highways. This is all there is in the bill.

Mr. COX. While used merely as public streets, this property can always be resumed by the Government. But if this bill be passed that cannot be done. The Government loses the absolute fee-simple.

Mr. HALE, of New York. My colleague is entirely mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot see that the position of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is correct. The act of Congress in the matter will be subject to repeal or alteration.

The Chair begs gentlemen to observe that he seeks to be exceedingly strict in all constructions of this kind; but he does not think it his province, as it certainly is not his wish, to be sufficiently stringent to make the rule an oppression upon the liberty of the House. The Chair does not think this bill fairly subject to the point of order, and therefore does not sustain the point.

Mr. SPEER. Is it in order to move to lay the bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. The first question in order will be upon the amendment reported by the committee, pending the consideration of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] moves to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. SPEER. And on that motion I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not the floor to make that motion. The reading of the bill has not yet been concluded. I am in possession of the floor.

Mr. COX. Would it be in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Not until the gentleman gets the floor for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The bill could be sent to the Committee of the Whole whenever it is in order to make the motion.

Mr. COX. I would suggest that that would be the proper course.

Mr. NEGLEY. While the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE is on the floor I wish to ask him whether the bill has been submitted for consideration to the Secretary of the Navy or any of the officials connected with the Navy Department. I observe that it proposes to construct a bridge immediately below the navy-yard.

Mr. HALE, of New York. O, no; the gentleman has the wrong bill. This bill has nothing at all to do with naval affairs.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House will observe another construction which it may be well to remember. Ever since the third Friday in each month was assigned to business from the District of Columbia, it has been held that any bill from that committee referred to the Committee of the Whole does not go to the General Calendar, but that, should the House go into Committee of the Whole on that day, such bill should be preferred to other measures. Therefore the point of order which has been raised would not, even if sustained, accomplish the purpose which gentlemen doubtless contemplate—sending the bill to the General Calendar. Such has not been the construction in regard to District business. The Committee on the District of Columbia being confined to the third Friday of each month, it is the established ruling that a bill reported from that committee, and liable to a point of order that would send it to the Committee of the Whole, will, when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole on that day, be preferred to all other bills.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Then, Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from New York will be allowed to proceed with this bill.

The SPEAKER. It will be seen, therefore, that the sending of a District bill on the third Friday in the month to the Committee of the Whole does not involve nearly so much as is ordinarily involved in sending a bill to the Committee of the Whole. The ruling now stated by the Chair has been the uniform construction for three years.

The reading of the bill having been interrupted by the point of order made by the gentleman from New York, the Clerk will now resume the reading.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, but was interrupted by Mr. HALE, of New York, who said: The Clerk is not reading the bill correctly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remark that the bill is in very excellent condition to faciliate the making of mistakes in regard to it.

Mr. COX. Then it ought to be recommitted.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I will state that the bill was presented in its present shape upon the approval of the principal reading clerk of the House, whom I considered it safe to follow in such a matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if he had been consulted, would have given different advice.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I would have been happy to consult the Chair instead of the clerk if I had had an opportunity. The Clerk was reading section 7 instead of section 6.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill; which was as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Joseph Williams, William J. Murtagh, Hallet Kilbourn, Benjamin F. Fuller, William J. Cowing, Samuel R. Bond, William Saunders, George W. Goodall, George A. McIlhenny, L. A. Bartlett, and L. H. Chandler, and their associates and assigns, be, and they are hereby, created a body-corporate, under the name of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company, with authority to construct and lay down a single or double track railway, with the necessary switches and turnouts, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, through and along the following streets and avenues: commencing on First street west, in front of the Capitol grounds, and running thence due north along said First street west to Massachusetts avenue, thence northwest along said avenue to Third street west, thence along Third street west to its intersection with New Jersey avenue, thence northwest along New Jersey avenue to O street north, thence along O street north to Twelfth street west, thence south along Twelfth street west to E street north, thence west along E street north to Fourteenth street west, thence south on Fourteenth street west to Ohio avenue, thence along said avenue to its intersection with Twelfth street west, thence south along said Twelfth street west to Virginia avenue, thence southeast along Virginia avenue to its intersection with Maryland avenue, thence northeast along Maryland avenue to First street west, the place of beginning, with the right to run public carriages thereon, drawn by horse-power, receiving therefor a rate of fare not exceeding five cents a passenger for any distance on said road, from its beginning to its terminus on First street west: Provided, That wherever the forgoing route may coincide with the route of any other duly-incorporated street-railroad company in the District, or connect portions of said route, but one set of tracks shall be used by both companies, who are hereby authorized and empowered to use such tracks in common, upon such fair and equitable terms as may be agreed upon by said companies, and in the event of the said companies failing to agree upon satisfactory terms, either of said companies may apply by petition to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which shall provide for proper notice to, and hearing of, all parties interested, and shall have power to determine the terms and conditions upon and under which the company hereby incorporated shall be entitled so to use and enjoy the track of such other street-railroad company, and the amount and manner of compensation to be paid therefor: And provided further, That either of the companies using such track in common shall be permitted to make the track so used a depot or general stopping-place to await passengers, but shall only be entitled to use the same for the ordinary passing of their cars, with the ordinary halts, and for the taking up and dropping of passengers.

SEC. 2. The road of said company, with all its property and franchises, shall be liable to taxation as is or may be provided by the general laws of the District of Columbia; and their cars or vehicles shall be subject to the provisions of such laws as to license and fees therefor.

SEC. 3. That the said railway shall be laid as near the center of the streets and avenues in the city of Washington as practicable (without interfering with, or passing over, the water or gas pipes) in the most approved manner adapted to street railways, with rails of the most approved pattern, to be determined by the board of public works, laid upon an even surface with the pavement of the streets and avenues; and the space between the two tracks (where two are laid) shall not be less than four feet, nor more than six feet in width, and the carriages shall not be less than six feet in width, the gauge to correspond with that of the Columbia Street Railway.

SEC. 4. That the said corporation hereby created shall be bound to keep said tracks, and a space of two feet beyond the outer rails thereof, and also the space between the tracks, at all times well paved and in good order, in such manner and with such material as may be directed by the board of public works, without expense to the United States or the said city.

SEC. 5. That nothing in this act shall prevent the Government at any time, at its option, from altering the grade, or otherwise improving all avenues and streets occupied by said road, or the said District from so altering and improving such streets and avenues and the sewerage thereof, as may be under their respective authority and control; and in such event it shall be the duty of said company to change their said railway so as to conform to such grade and pavement.

SEC. 6. That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed, by the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize said body-corporate to issue any note, token, or device, scrip, or other evidence of debt, to be used as currency.

SEC. 8. That the capital stock of said company shall not be less than $200,000, nor more than $500,000, and that the stock shall be divided into shares of fifty dollars each, and shall be deemed personal property, transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said company may direct.

SEC. 9. That the said company shall place first-class cars on said railway, with all the modern improvements, for the convenience and comfort of passengers, and shall run cars thereon during the day, and as late at night as ten o'clock, and as often as every fifteen minutes.

SEC. 10. That the said company shall provide such passenger rooms, offices, stables, and depots at such points as the business of the road and the convenience of the public may require; and said company is hereby authorized to lay such rails through transverse streets or avenues as may be necessary for connecting the said stables, depots, and offices with the main tracks; and the said company is hereby authorized to purchase or lease such lands or buildings as may be necessary for the passenger rooms, ticket offices, stables, and depots above named.

SEC. 11. That all articles of value that may be inadvertently left in any of the cars or other vehicles of said company, shall be taken to its principal depot and entered in a book of record of unclaimed goods, which book shall be open to the inspection of the public at all reasonable hours.

SEC. 12. That within thirty days after the passage and approval of this act the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, or if any refuse to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall cause books of subscription to the capital stock of said company to be opened, and kept open, in some convenient and accessible place or places in the city of Washington, for a period to be fixed by said corporators, not less than two days; and said corporators shall give public notice, by advertisement in not less than two daily papers published in the city of Washington, of the time when and the place where said books shall be opened, and subscribers upon said books to the capital stock of the company shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That no one individual shall be allowed to subscribe for more than two hundred shares of said stock: Provided further, That every subscriber shall pay, at the time of subscribing, 10 per cent. of the amount by him subscribed, to the treasurer of said company, or his subscription shall be null and void. And when the books of subscription to the capital stock of said company shall be closed, the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, and in case any of them refuse to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall within ten days thereafter call the first meeting of the stockholders of said company, to meet within ten days thereafter, for the choice of seven directors, of which public notice shall be given for three days in not less than two newspapers published daily in the city of Washington, or by written or printed personal notice to each stockholder by the secretary or clerk of the said corporation. And in all meetings of the stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy.

SEC. 13. That the government and direction of the affairs of the company shall be vested in a board of directors, seven in number, who shall be stockholders, and who shall hold their office for one year, or until others are duly elected and qualified to take their places as directors. And the said directors (a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum) shall elect one of their number to be president of the board, who shall also be president of the company; and they shall also choose a treasurer, who shall be a stockholder, and who shall give bonds, with security, to said company, in such sum as the said directors may require, for the faithful discharge of his trust; and said board shall also elect a secretary, who shall also be a stockholder, and who shall perform such duties as usually pertain to said office. In case of a vacancy in the board of directors, by death, resignation, or otherwise, of any director, the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled by the remaining directors.

SEC. 14. That the directors shall have full power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper respecting the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company, not contrary to the charter, or the laws of the United States or of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the directors of said company shall have power to require the subscribers to the capital stock to pay the amount by them respectively subscribed, at such time, (after the first installment,) in such manner, and in such amounts as they may deem proper; and if any stockholder shall refuse or neglect to pay any installment, as required by a resolution of the board of directors, after reasonable notice of the same, the said board of directors may sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, so many shares of his said stock as shall pay said installment, (and the highest bidder shall be taken to be the person who offers to purchase the least number of shares for the assessment due,) under such general regulations as may be adopted in the by-laws of said company; or said body-corporate may sue and collect the same from any delinquent subscriber in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 15. That there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders for choice of directors, to be holden at such time and place, under such conditions, and upon such notice, as the said company, in their by-laws, may prescribe; and said directors shall annually make a report of their doings to the stockholders in general meeting.

SEC. 16. That if any person or persons shall willfully and unnecessarily obstruct or impede the passage of the cars of said railway, or destroy or injure the cars, depot, stations, or other property belonging to said railway company, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense the sum of ten dollars to said company, to be recovered and disposed of as other fines and penalties in said District, and shall remain liable, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his, her, or their act, as aforesaid; but no suit shall be brought unless commenced within sixty days after such offense shall have been committed.

SEC. 17. That unless said corporation shall commence to lay the said track within four months, and complete their said railway within fifteen months after the passage of this act, then this act shall be null and void, and no rights whatsoever shall be acquired under it.

SEC. 18. That no person shall be prohibited the right to travel on any part of said road, or ejected from the cars thereof, for any other cause than that of being drunk, disorderly, unclean, contagiously diseased, refusing to pay the legal fare exacted, or to comply with the general regulations of the company.

SEC. 19. That each of the stockholders in the said railway company shall be liable individually for all the debts and liabilities of the said company to an amount equal to the value of stock held by such stockholder.

SEC. 20. That all the provisions of the act incorporating the Columbia Railway Company, requiring reports of expenditures, earnings, and otherwise, shall be applicable to the company herein incorporated, which shall make reports as in said act required.

FRANK Y. COMMAGERE.

Mr. DONNAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] has yielded to me for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the action taken yesterday on motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NEGLEY,] withdrawing from the files of the House the papers in the case of Frank Y. Commagere, "no adverse report having been made in the case." An adverse report was made two weeks since by the Committee on Military Affairs, and on its recommendation the petition was laid upon the table.

I move to reconsider the vote by which permission was granted for the withdrawal of the papers.

Mr. NEGLEY. I make no objection to the gentleman's motion to reconsider. I was not aware of the fact there had been any adverse report in the case. I made it at the request and solicitation of the gentleman interested.

The motion was agreed to; and the House then refused to grant permission for the withdrawal of the papers in the case of Frank Y. Commagere, an adverse report having been made on it.

INCORPORATION OF A STREET RAILWAY.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the incorporation of a street railroad company, with permission to lay a track beginning at the east front of the Capitol.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does not the point of order lie against this bill?

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. HALE, of New York. It is for the incorporation of a street railway, with permission to lay a track beginning on First street east, in front of the Capitol, running up from there, on First street, northerly to Massachusetts avenue, then through Massachusetts avenue to Third street north, by Third street to O, through O westerly to Twelfth, south to Twelfth, with a detour to Fourteenth by Maryland avenue and Virginia avenue on the Island, and back by Virginia avenue and Maryland avenue to First street again.

The bill is upon the file of members. It is an early bill. The committee reported amendments, twelve in number, which I will state briefly.

The first and second are merely slight alterations of the route, the first carrying it to Massachusetts avenue, and the second inserting an omission caused by a clerical error.

The third changes the rate of fare proposed by the original bill from six to five cents.

The fourth amendment is in regard to the use by this road and other roads, which may have short distances to pass over on a part of the same street by a single track, or a pair of tracks, by arrangement between the companies or by judicial action.

The second section, as printed in the bill, is stricken out and another substituted for it, making all the property of the company, including not only its tracks but its personal property and its franchises, subject to taxation under the laws of the District of Columbia.

The sixth amendment strikes out in the first section, "the engineer in charge of public buildings to determine the character of the rails and the style of construction;" and refers that question to the board of public works, requiring the road to be built in the most approved manner adapted to street railways, and the rails to be of the most approved pattern, under the direction of the board of public works.

The seventh amendment to the fourth section provides the space between the tracks shall be kept well paved and in good order, in such a manner and with such material as may be provided by the board of public works.

The eighth amendment strikes out the sixteenth section. It seems to the committee not to be desirable legislation.

The ninth amendment strikes out the first two lines of the seventeenth section, providing the company shall for all time have the free and uninterrupted use of the railway.

The tenth and eleventh amendments, in section 18, require the company to commence the construction of the road within four months, and to complete it within sixteen months after the passage of this act.

The twelfth amendment strikes out all of the twenty-second section, which is a general repealing clause of all acts inconsistent with this.

I have only to say, Mr. Speaker, the committee, through its subcommittee, carefully examined and went over the ground of this road, and came to the conclusion, I think unanimously, it was a desirable road and ought to be constructed for the interest and convenience of the public. I believe the committee have guarded it in all respects by provisions protecting the public interests in reference to the control of the road and as to the liability of the stockholders, and in everything else pertaining to the public interest. If any gentleman desires to make further inquiry in regard to the provisions of the bill, I will be happy to answer him. If not, I will demand the previous question, and move that the bill be put on its passage.

Mr. SPEER. It seems to me extraordinary on the part of this committee to rush through a bill with so many amendments, which have not been printed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York whether there is anything in the bill to prevent Congress hereafter providing for the reduction of the fare below five cents?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I have no doubt whatever that Congress will have the right to reduce the rate of fare on this road to any amount it may see fit.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to offer an amendment?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I will hear it read.

Mr. CLYMER. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk readas follows:

Add to the first section the following:

And provided further, That in all the streets and avenues along and through which the said road is located and built, it shall be the duty of the said company, at its own costs and charges, to keep the same within and along the tracks so laid in like order and repair as such streets and avenues were before the construction of said road.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CLYMER,] if he will examine the amendments proposed by the committee, will find that they cover completely the ground embraced in the amendment he desires to offer. They require, in regard to the tracks and for two feet outside the tracks, and between the tracks and between the two sets of tracks, that they shall be kept properly paved, and in such manner and with such material as shall be approved by the board of public works.

Mr. CLYMER. I was only induced to prepare hurriedly the amendment I have read because, not being printed, it was impossible to know what the amendments of the committee contained. I really would appeal to my friend from New York to permit the bill, with amendments, to be printed. A public bill would not be allowed to pass without being printed, so that every one might have an opportunity of examining its provisions. And I think a private bill, so materially affecting private rights in this District, should be printed, that every one may have an opportunity of understanding what it contains.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The bill itself is printed and the amendments are on the table.

Mr. CLYMER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The bill, as I have said, is printed. The amendments proposed by the committee were not perfected until this morning, and it was impossible for the committee to have them printed. I have undertaken to state to the House as carefully as possible their provisions, and they have been read, and I do not think there is anything in them which should require the deferring of this bill, which will be the deferring of it for a month at least.

The amendments are all made in the direction of protection to the public. And so far as the matters which they bring up are concerned, I think they are everything which can be desired.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the attention of the House for one moment, but on account of the noise which prevails I cannot even hear myself talk.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

Mr. COX. I was about to state one reason why this bill ought to be recommitted. The gentleman says the original bill was printed. So it was. I got the printed bill this morning. The gentlemen along the route who were interested in this bill had the printed bill also. That bill has been amended since I saw it this morning, by the action of the committee. It has been vitally amended so as to change the tracks and to change many of the provisions. Perhaps it is a better bill. Perhaps it guards the public interests better. But the amendments are not printed so as to let us know whether it does so or not.

As this involves the giving away of the public property, and forever in one sense, it involves a new system of street railways here. It brings up discussions which can just as well be postponed as not for one month at least, and I hope my distinguished colleague will not urge this bill on Congress at this time, when we are not prepared to understand the routes proposed by the amendments or anything about it except from the explanation which the gentleman has given us, and to which the House could not pay attention in its present condition. I will therefore move, if the gentleman will allow me, to recommit this bill to the committee.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Not just now.

Mr. COX. I reserve that motion.

Mr. HALE, of New York. My colleague insists that the amendments to this bill change substantially the route of the road. They change it for four blocks, sending it four blocks farther up First street, which it then leaves at Massachusetts avenue instead of leaving First street on Indiana avenue. It is to go up First street for that distance instead of Third street. And that change was made with the express assent and approval of the parties interested, who desired that the road should not go through Third street.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to ask the gentleman if the residents along the line of the route to which the change is made and the property-holders along that line are aware that we are asked to pass a bill affecting their interests.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not know whether they know of it or not. But I will say that there are no property-holders there likely to object; for it does not run through a street of residences, but through a street containing shops, warehouses, and the like. I think that without doubt they will all be favorable to it.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to have an amendment read?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I desire to offer as an additional section to the bill the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That the said company shall, before they commence to lay their tracks, pay to the property-owners on the said streets their proportionable share of the value of the wood or other pavements along the said track, and for two feet on each side, which has been assessed against the said property-owners and paid by them.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I decline to yield for that amendment.

Mr. COX. Will my colleague allow me to explain it?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. COX. It is very well known that in this city there have been large assessments made on property-holders for relaying the pavements.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] allow the amendment of his colleague to be offered?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not.

Mr. COX. Then I cannot discuss it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I now move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. SPEER. Pending that question, I move that the bill be laid on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 8 voting in the affirmative; not a sufficient number.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the bill on the table; and upon a division there were—ayes 47, noes 53; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE of New York, and Mr. SPEER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 49, noes not counted.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. COX. I move that this bill be recommitted and printed.

The SPEAKER. Pending the call for the previous question, the only motion in order in relation to the bill is a motion to lay on the table, which the House has just negatived.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SPEER. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 88, not voting 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Barrere, Begole, Bradley, Burleigh, Cannon, Cason, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crocker, Crooke, Donnan, Dunnell, Eames, Eldredge, Farwell, Field, Frye, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, John B. So the bill was passed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. BELL, is detained from the House by sickness.

ANACOSTIA AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. HALE, of New York, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2103) giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, and to regulate its construction and operation; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

WASHINGTON CITY AND POINT LOOKOUT RAILROAD.

Mr. RICE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2075) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company, which, by the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873, was authorized to construct their railroad within said District, may enter the city of Washington with their said railroad, and construct the same within the limits of the said city on and by the following route: Beginning at a point on the line of said railroad east of the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River; thence to the said Eastern Branch, and crossing the same by a suitable bridge and causeway, so as not to obstruct navigation, entering the city of Washington south of O street south, and east of James Creek; thence to, along, and across James Creek, at or near its intersection with O street south; thence in a northerly and westerly direction to a point near the southern terminus of Eighth street west; thence along or near the bank of the Potomac River to a point near the southern terminus of Fourteenth street southwest; thence westwardly, south of the public grounds, to a point near the southern terminus of Fifteenth street southwest; thence northwestwardly, south of the public grounds, to some point at or near the bank of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal; thence along or near said bank to the junction of Rock Creek with the Potomac River; thence westwardly or northwestwardly, by the most eligible route, to a point near the northern terminus of the aqueduct bridge in the city of Georgetown; thence to the northwestern boundary between the District of Columbia and the State of Maryland, with the authority to construct a bridge across the Potomac River, above navigation; and the said Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company is hereby authorized to construct a railroad within the District of Columbia and outside the limits of the city of Washington, from its road to suitable points on the branches of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad: Provided, That the track of said railroad shall not be laid within such a distance of the Naval Observatory as to disturb the operations there conducted: And provided further, That the bridge or causeway across the Eastern Branch hereinbefore provided for shall not, nor shall any part thereof, be constructed until complete plans and written specifications shall be first submitted to the Secretary of the Navy, and be approved by him in writing, and a duplicate of such plans, specifications, and approval shall be filed in the office of said Secretary; and at any time before, during, or after the construction of such bridge, the Secretary of the Navy, if, in his judgment, such bridge as built, or as proposed to be built by such plans and specifications, shall prove, or be likely to prove, a substantial obstruction to the navigation of the said Eastern Branch, may require any alteration or modification of such plans or specifications, or of such bridge when built, to obviate such obstructions, which alterations or modifications shall be thereupon made by said company, its successors or assigns, at its and their sole expense: And provided further, That no part of said road through or in the District of Columbia, including the bridge across the Potomac River, shall be constructed, in whole or in part, except upon a specific location within the provisions of this act, and upon plans and specifications in writing, to be approved in writing by the Secretary of War, and a duplicate of such location, plans, specifications, and approval shall be filed in the office of said Secretary: And provided further, That no grading shall be done or rails laid by the said Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company, in the city of Washington, until it shall have graded and tied the entire line of its railroad from a point on the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, at or near Brandywine City, in Prince George's County, Maryland, to a point on the railroad now constructed by the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company, partly within the county of Prince George's, and partly within the District of Columbia: And provided further, That in the contemplated improvement of the harbor of Washington City, as recommended by a board of survey created by act of Congress approved March 5, 1872, the said railroad company may be required to transfer its tracks to, or lay the same along, such streets and avenues embraced in such improvement as shall be directed by the authorities in charge of such improvement: And provided further, That all rights granted to said Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company by this act shall cease and determine unless said company shall complete its road from a point at or near Brandywine City, Prince George's County, Maryland, to the city of Washington, within two years from the 1st day of July, 1874.

SEC. 2. That in all cases where the party or parties claimant shall appeal to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873, the said company, if it shall require the immediate use of the property condemned and valued as aforesaid, before an appeal can be heard or decided, may execute and tender a bond to the party or parties aforesaid, in at least double the sum found by the jury, with sureties to be approved by the supreme court of said District, and with a condition to pay, without delay, such sum and costs as may be awarded by the said court; and upon the delivery or tender of such bond, the said company may proceed to the construction of their said road as if the party or parties claimant and the said company had agreed upon the compensation to be paid for the property to be used; and that in all cases where the said company shall appeal, and give bond as provided in said section 3 of said act, they may have the power to proceed in the construction of their road and appropriation of the property for the uses thereof as if no appeal had been taken and the parties had agreed upon the compensation for the property required.

SEC. 3. That this act may be modified, amended, or repealed by Congress at any time.

Mr. NEGLEY. I raise the point of order that this bill contemplates the use and occupancy of public property other than streets, and also that it proposes the construction of a bridge across the Eastern Branch, below the navy-yard, and therefore it should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICE. If the point of order is made against this bill, it must be upon the same principle that the point of order was made against the bill under consideration a short time ago.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is an essential difference between the two bills. The bill against which the point of order was raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] gave to a certain horse-railway company the right to go through public streets already dedicated to public use. This bill gives the right to a railroad company to go through and over a part of the public lands of the United States within the District of Columbia set apart for park purposes.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I think the Chair is in error. The language of the bill is that the road shall go "south of the public grounds."

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Does it not give the right to construct a bridge across a navigable stream?

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes also to call the attention of the House to this fact: the law of amendment is one of the severest tests that can be applied to a bill. The Chair observes that on the third page of this bill, after describing the route of this railroad, there is the following proviso:

Provided, That the tracks of the said railroad shall not be laid within such a distance of the Naval Observatory as to disturb the operations there conducted.

Now, suppose the House should strike out that proviso; this company would then be at liberty to carry its track under the very eaves of the observatory building.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The Speaker will allow me to say that the provision of which the language quoted is a part prohibits the company from entering or encroaching upon the public grounds. And the bill also secures the instruments of the observatory from the vibrations which would take place if the road ran along the solid ground; in other words, the road is required to be built upon piles so as not to disturb the operations of the observatory, the instruments of which are in many cases very delicate.

Mr. NEGLEY. If the gentleman's statement is correct, then this company would use a portion of the present harbor facilities.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The city of Washington has no harbor. I hope Congress will assist it to have one at some time. There certainly is no harbor in front of Washington now, but simply a flat, which is inundated daily with the movements of the tide.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Is not a part of the grant the right to construct a bridge?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair it gives distinctly a right to construct two bridges.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Undoubtedly that is the fact.

The SPEAKER. And to use the public grounds for that purpose.

Mr. CHIPMAN. No, sir. The public grounds do not abut upon the river where it is proposed this bridge shall cross. If in granting the mere right to cross in the air over a navigable stream the Government yields property, I suppose the point of the gentleman from Wisconsin is a good one; but I do not think that the right to construct a bridge is liable to that objection.

The SPEAKER. Do not the public grounds reach the Potomac at the point in question?

Mr. CHIPMAN. They do not at the point where it is proposed this bridge shall cross the Eastern Branch.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to be overstrict upon questions of this kind, for he would regret to bring the rule into odium by unnecessary stringency of construction.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I do not think the bill is objectionable in any feature. It is one which certainly ought to be passed at some time.

Mr. RICE. I hope the point of order may be withdrawn that I may say a few words about this railroad.

Mr. NEGLEY. If the gentleman so desires, I am willing to reserve the point of order until he shall have spoken.

Mr. RICE. Mr. Speaker, it is quite surprising to me to witness on this occasion so much opposition in this House to the building of a railway in a city which so much needs railroad facilities—a railway, too, which is calculated to subserve the best interests of so many citizens. Whatever may be the reason, the fact is before us that the enterprise meets with opposition.

It is proposed to build this railroad from the northwestern line of the District of Columbia, through the District and through the State of Maryland, between the Potomac River and the Chesapeake Bay, down to the mouth of the Potomac. On the northwestern line of the District it will connect with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, so as to facilitate the transportation of coal, (which is expected to be a matter of great convenience and profit to the people,) by means of a connection with Point Lookout, where it is proposed to establish a port for the shipment of coal to the West Indies, to South America, and to any other place where the people may be disposed to buy it. It is expected that a large trade may thus be built up. Thus this road is calculated to be a great advantage to the citizens of this District.

This railroad company has had some conflict with another railroad company called the Southern Maryland Railroad Company. Those two companies had the right of way through the State of Maryland down to Point Lookout. When they both went to work, and were satisfied each was in earnest, they stopped the work, met together, and entered into a contract with each other, by which the Southern Maryland Railroad was to build its railroad from the mouth of the Potomac River to Brandywine—I think about sixty-six miles, but I am not sure of distances—and that this road to Point Lookout should build it from Brandywine into the city of Washington.

Now, during the time this was being discussed the bill was printed and laid before the committee; and as far as I know the committee were unanimous in reporting this bill. It has been carefully examined; they fully believe no injury will be done to the Southern Maryland Railroad by the passage of this bill. They believe it is essentially right and for the benefit of all classes of the people. The construction of the road is so guarded that no private interest can be injured. The bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, which is, I believe, called the Anacostia River, is to be built under the supervision and subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, and if found after being built to be improperly placed, it is to be changed and altered to suit the Secretary of the Navy at the expense of the railroad company. Where it enters the city of Washington it skirts the southern side and goes to Georgetown. The line, although designated, is not clearly defined, but that line is to be located by the Government engineers under the supervison of the Secretary of War. When it gets above the navigation on the Potomac, it builds a bridge across the river, above navigation, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. NEGLEY. Allow me to correct the gentleman. The bridge is not above navigation, but it is proposed to build this bridge two hundred feet below the navy-yard in the city of Washington.

Mr. RICE. I speak of the bridge which is to be built above navigation. We are going to build two bridges if we can, although it seems hard to get one. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, this is all subject to the approval of the Secretary of War. There is railroad business to be done on it. All the products of the State of Maryland which seek market in the city of Washington would be brought here over it, and all the coal necessary to go South would be carried on it. Trade is growing rapidly. There is no private interest injured. The whole road is to be built under the control of competent Government officers who are trusted with such work all the time. There is no objection which can be offered to the building of this railroad, I make bold to say, except it be that it may damage the interest of some other company. I hope there will be no point of order raised. If there are those who think it ought not to be done, why then vote it down. I hope I shall never be the means of bringing a bill into this House which is not right, so far as I can understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say, from a full examination of the bill, he is of the opinion the point of order does not lie against it.

Mr. RICE. Then I demand the previous question, and move that the bill be put upon its passage.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope this House will not agree to any such hasty proceeding. It is here contemplated in this bill to construct a bridge below the navy-yard upon which the Government has expended millions of dollars in buildings and for machinery. You propose to interpose by the construction of this bridge an obstruction to any communication on the part of our vessels with this navy-yard.

Mr. RICE. Not more than two vessels go there in a month. Everybody understands that.

Mr. DAWES. Is it proposed to run along the water front on the other side of the Eastern Branch?

Mr. RICE. The location of the road is according to plans and specifications, and where it runs through the District the location is left entirely to engineers of the Government, subject to the approval of the proper Department.

Mr. DAWES. There is a public institution on the other side, and I would like to know from the gentleman whether there is anything in this bill to prevent this railroad from cutting that institution off from its communication with the river.

Mr. RICE. It is all to be under the control of the Government officers named in the bill.

Mr. DAWES. Does not the gentleman think it will be better for us to locate the line of the road in this bill if we are to pass it at all?

Mr. RICE. That may be the case, but I think engineers of the country are better able to locate a railroad line than we are.

Mr. DAWES. There is a Government institution of great value owning a large tract of land just over the Eastern Branch, which has a wharf built there for purposes connected with the carrying on of that institution. If this road runs between the river and that institution, as it has been marked down on the maps, would it not cut off this entire institution from the water-front?

Mr. RICE. Does the gentleman mean the Government Asylum on the other side of the Eastern Branch?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICE. I do not understand that it will do so.

Mr. DAWES. Whereabouts do you propose to cross the Branch?

Mr. RICE. At some point between the arsenal and the navy-yard.

Mr. DAWES. So that all ships of war that come to the navy-yard must pass through the draw?

Mr. RICE. Every one must go through the draw.

Mr. NEGLEY. I wish to call attention to another fact. There is here no protection for the interests of the Government. The company are permitted to build this bridge where and how they please.

Mr. RICE. In answer to the gentleman, I will say that this bridge, or this draw, is to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. NEGLEY. The Secretary of the Navy has nothing to do with these matters. They belong to the Secretary of War.

Mr. RICE. We supposed that the Secretary of the Navy, having to do with the Navy, would have something to do with a draw-bridge through which its ships will have to pass.

Mr. DAWES. This is the first moment that I have known that it was proposed to have this bridge between the navy-yard and the Potomac River. I am supposing that it is to be a draw-bridge.

Mr. NEGLEY. The bill does not provide for a draw-bridge.

Mr. DAWES. Then the harbor of the navy-yard will be at the mercy of the currents that may be established by the piers made for this bridge.

Mr. RICE. The only question is whether railroads shall be built in the United States. They are built so as to cross the Mississippi River, and so as to cross the Ohio River; and there are constant complaints of the loss of property occasioned by their obstructing navigation. But then the Congress of the United States is of opinion that railroads are essential to the prosperity of the country, and accordingly it gives the railroads the right to cross these rivers. Now I want to know whether the railroad shall not be permitted to cross this shallow piece of water, the Eastern Branch. There is scarcely ever anything but a barge that goes up that Eastern Branch unless it be the ships that go to the navy-yard, and for these there will be a bridge of ample draw.

Mr. NEGLEY. I would like the gentleman to show me where that is.

Mr. RICE. It is in the bill which has been read.

Mr. PELHAM. The bill provides, on the third page, line 41—

That the bridge or causeway across the Eastern Branch, hereinbefore provided for, shall not, nor shall any part thereof, be constructed until complete plans and written specifications shall be first submitted to the Secretary of the Navy and be approved by him in writing.

And the bill further authorizes the Secretary of the Navy, if he shall find at any time afterward that the bridge proves or is likely to prove a substantial obstruction to navigation, to cause it to be removed.

Mr. NEGLEY. I am astonished that any gentleman or any committee would introduce a bill which places obstructions on the navigation of so important a channel as this leading to the navy-yard without proper guards and restrictions.

Mr. RICE. I have moved the previous question, and call for a vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICE] one question. Does this interfere with the grounds below the Executive Mansion, set apart for park purposes?

Mr. RICE. It does not.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire also to state that I have consulted the officials of the Navy Department, and they seriously object to the construction of this bridge or any interference with the channel of the river below the navy-yard.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICE] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. RICE. I have agreed to yield to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. I desire the attention of the House for a very few moments in regard to this bill; and I trust my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICE,] will not insist on his call for the previous question until some wider limits have been allowed for the discussion of this matter, if anybody desires to discuss it.

Mr. RICE. I wish to clear myself on that point. I had no desire myself to close debate by calling the previous question. But I had noticed that that was very much the fashion, and I desire to be in the fashion. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. The Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company was organized under the laws of Maryland, to build a railroad from Point Lookout, on the Maryland shore, up the northern side of the Potomac to the city of Washington. Another railroad, known as the Southern Maryland Railroad Company, was also chartered to run over a route substantially parallel with the route of this road. After some rivalry these two roads arrived at an arrangement, by which the Southern Maryland Company was to build a road from Point Lookout up to Brandywine, Prince George's County, Maryland; while the Washington City and Point Lookout Company were to build the road from Brandywine here.

By an act of Congress passed last winter, January, 1873, and to be found in the seventeenth volume of the Statutes, page 413, the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company were authorized to come into the District of Columbia and establish a road there. No provision was made by that law for its construction within the city of Washington. The object of the present act is to provide for the road coming within the city of Washington, which is, of course, essential not only to make the road itself of any value, but to make it contribute in any way to the welfare or prosperity of this city. It is to enable the company to do this that the present bill is introduced.

In order to this, one of two things must be done: either the road must cross the Eastern Branch at a point above the navy-yard and then come into the city from the north in some manner, either following the river or entering at a point distant from the river, or it must be allowed to cross at a point below the navy-yard. Very grave and serious objections, involving the welfare of the city, were found to exist in regard to its coming in at a point remote from the river.

The committee, after looking over the whole subject, unanimously agreed, I think, that if a bridge could be built below the navy-yard across the Eastern Branch which should not prejudice the interests of the Government, which should not interfere with the necessary operations of the navy-yard, or with the navigation of that stream so far as the United States was interested in its navigation—if such a bridge could be built it would be better that this company should be permitted to cross below the navy-yard. This bill has been drawn with the strongest guards that the committee by their united efforts were able to place about it, to permit the road to cross the Eastern Branch below the navy-yard, provided it could be done not only in such a way as not to interfere with navigation, but under the direct supervision and authority in every respect of the Secretary of the Navy, who has to approve the plans and specifications from beginning to end. Not a stroke of work can be done upon that bridge until those plans and specifications are filed in his office with his approval. Not only that; the committee did not stop there——

Mr. SCOFIELD. A question. I believe that in all the bills we have passed permitting the construction of bridges across the Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri Rivers, we ourselves have provided for the length of span, and the height of bridge above low-water mark, and then have directed the Secretary of War or the engineer of the War Department to see that the railroad company constructing that bridge did not violate the law. This bill omits all that precaution, and leaves it for the Secretary of the Navy to say whether this bridge shall have a span of one hundred feet or of fifty feet, and how high it shall be above low water. The present Secretary of the Navy is a man of great firmness and ability; but this bill leaves him alone to encounter one of the most powerful railroad corporations of the country.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] has not yet asked the question for which I yielded. He has only interjected a speech into mine which I will endeavor to answer. The committee have done precisely what the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests they have done. Instead of putting any limitation into this bill, they have done what I was stating when I was interrupted by the gentleman proposing to ask me a question. They have left the whole subject to the Secretary of the Navy, and for this reason: the Eastern Branch of the Potomac is unlike the Mississippi, and the Ohio, and the other rivers to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has referred, in respect to the navigation upon it. There is no commerce there, there is no navigation there except the navigation of the United States in connection with the navy-yard, of which the Secretary of the Navy is by his position the express guardian and defender.

The committee therefore thought it better, instead of undertaking to prescribe these rules, that they should leave the whole matter to the Secretary of the Navy, the proper and appropriate guardian of the interests of the United States in this respect; that he should specify the width of the draw, the height of the bridge, and everything else necessary to guard the interests of the United States before the construction of this bridge shall be entered upon.

The committee did not content themselves with that. Coming now to the point where I was when the gentleman interrupted me, I will say that the committee left this not merely subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Navy at the beginning, but provided that at any time before, during, or after the building of the bridge, if it shall be found by experience, or deemed probable by observation, that the bridge is, or is likely to be, an impediment to navigation, the Secretary of the Navy through all time, whether the present excellent Secretary or any other, may without question require the proprietors of the bridge to make precisely such alterations and modifications as he may see fit to direct. The committee have left the whole matter in the guardianship and charge of the Navy Department; and the Navy Department is the only being, artificial or natural, that can be seriously affected by any improper construction of this bridge.

Now it seems to me that in doing this the committee have certainly done all that it is in the power of man to do to protect the interests of the United States in case this bridge is to be built there. The question whether, under any circumstances, a bridge shall be permitted to be built there is a question which I apprehend the committee are entirely willing to submit to the decision of the House.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I wish to interrupt the gentleman for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have been told that it is projected that the line of this road along the water-front shall be upon piling, which would, of course, be directly along the river-front. Now I want to ask the gentleman—and from his investigation he must know whether it is so or not—if this is true. If it be true, would it not be giving this company very great privileges and great control over this water-front; and would it not end in the company becoming the owner of the frontage or wharf property of this city? That has been said to be the plan of this company. I ask this question in good faith, because, if it is answered in the affirmative, it seems to me that in this grant we may give privileges which in the future will loom up as oppressive. I do not say that it is so.

A MEMBER. It is not.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. What is the probable line that this road is to take, so far as the investigation of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] goes?

Mr. CHIPMAN. With all deference to the gentleman reporting the bill, I ask him to permit me to answer that question. There is now before Congress a report made by a board of very high officers, recommending that ultimately the river-front of Washington be the location of the depots of all railroads entering the city, so that the railroad system shall center upon the river-front; and a railroad avenue has been marked out, looking to the future improvement of the river-front.

Now, in reply to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] I will say that this bill gives only the right of way over ground which is every twenty-four hours inundated. The company will have only the right to lay tracks on the piles; they will not obtain any ground.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. But would not that line of piling extend in front of the whole shore?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Of course. But this bill provides that when the improvement of the river-front shall ultimately be made, the company shall remove their tracks to such place as the authorities in charge of the river improvement shall dictate. And allow me to say that if this company should undertake, under the charter, the enterprise of filling up the flat in front of Washington City, it will be a "consummation devoutly to be wished." The cost of such a work would probably be about $9,000,000.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. My apprehension was that a company, once locating their tracks there, could not be dispossessed.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to ask the Delegate from the District who is the vice-president of this railroad.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I will answer the gentleman that I happen to be honored with that position. I will add that I have no personal interest in this road, except that, as a citizen of the District, I desire to see it built. I am not pecuniarily interested in any way in this enterprise. I have accepted the position simply because the compliment has been paid to me. If there is anything wrong in the bill, let it be pointed out. The members of the committee understood my relations to the company, as I suppose many on the floor here did. My only desire is to encourage all railroads seeking entry to the city, and I believe there is no interest of the people or the Government that the committee has not fully protected.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to say one word.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. SPEER. In answer to the Delegate from the District [Mr. CHIPMAN] I desire to say——

Mr. HALE, of New York. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] will not attempt to take me from the floor by force.

Mr. SPEER. I have made no such attempt.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I thought it had that appearance.

Mr. SPEER. Does the gentleman desire to object to my making a reply to the Delegate from the District?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Certainly; I have not suspended my remarks for the purpose of allowing debate between other gentlemen.

Mr. SPEER. I did not know the gentleman from New York was still holding the floor. I intended no discourtesy whatever to him.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill——

Mr. SPEER. I thought the gentleman yielded to me.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman certainly misunderstood me. I did not.

Mr. SPEER. I thought you said you would if I desired.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I hope the gentleman will yield.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I cannot.

Mr. SPEER. After the vice-president of this road has been permitted to make an assault on me and my motives——

Mr. HALE, of New York. I did not hear any such assault.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I disclaim any intention to make any assault.

Mr. HALE, of New York. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to respond to an assault which I failed to hear, I will yield to him for a few moments.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Speaker, the Delegate from the District questions, it seems, the right of a Representative of the people to let the House know that an officer of a corporation is here enlightening the Representatives of the people as to their duty. I intended nothing personal to the gentleman in the inquiry I made. There would have been no indelicacy on his part in speaking on this question if he had first told the House the personal relations he occupied toward this company. But when the vice-president of a railroad company comes before the Congress of the United States asking for its bounty, for its privileges, for the franchises of the people, he should not stand upon nice points of etiquette and delicacy, nor attempt to taunt me or any other Representative on this floor when I put to him a proper and respectful question.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEER. I did not know there was anything wrong in this bill; but I say it is indelicate for the vice-president of a railroad to stand here publicly before the nation advocating its interests.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I make the point of order that the gentleman's remarks are not germane.

Mr. SPEER. They are germane to the vice-president of this company.

Mr. HALE, of New York. They certainly have not been justified by any supposed attack made upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania by the Delegate from this District.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] yield to me to make a motion to adjourn?

Mr. HALE, of New York. No, sir; not now.

A MEMBER. O, no; not till we pass this railroad bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE, of New York. I have made several efforts to say that the specific location of this road within the general limits defined by the bill, and also its construction in every respect—the plans, specifications, &c.—are all made subject to the approval of the Secretary of War. The reason for this provision is that the control of the public works in Washington City is vested in the Engineer Department, whose action is always through the Secretary of War. Every effort has been made to protect fully the public rights in this respect, and I believe successfully.

I do not think the route of the proposed railroad, as prescribed in the bill, infringes upon the public parks or upon the water-front, or anything else likely to work to the public prejudice.

I will add, I think no member of the committee reporting this bill has any sort of interest in the question of its construction in any other way except for the public benefit; that, and that only.

Now it has been said, I know not with how much truth, that the Pennsylvania Central Railroad, known as "Tom Scott's road," had strong reasons for opposing the passage of this bill. I do not know it, and do not know why it should have such reasons. Perhaps one of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, on opposite sides in politics, who do oppose this bill so strenuously can say whether or not the opposition is prompted by the Pennsylvania Central Railroad.

Mr. SPEER. I will answer for myself first, and then my colleague can answer for himself. This is the first time I ever heard Mr. Scott had anything to do with it; I never spoke to Mr. Scott on the subject. I never heard directly or indirectly from any one connected with the road on the subject. The gentleman states that Mr. Scott is interested, and it shows he knows more about who is interested in it than I do.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I am glad if I do.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I think if the gentleman from New York had proper motives he would not be insinuating against any other men.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I have made no insinuation against any other man.

Mr. SPEER. I think it was an insinuation.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I merely stated a fact.

Mr. NEGLEY. It was not a fact.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The opposition to this bill appears to be pressed in the interest of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, which is owned by the Pennsylvania Central Railroad. If that is an imputation——

Mr. NEGLEY. It is an imputation. No person connected with that road ever intimated to me a single objection against it.

Mr. POTTER. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. HALE, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. POTTER. How long has this company been incorporated?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I do not know.

Mr. POTTER. Let me inquire further whether during all the years it has been incorporated it has constructed a single mile of railroad, and whether we have any reason to expect it will not be sold to somebody else just so soon as this bill has passed and become a law?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I will answer, so far as my colleague's questions are concerned, by saying, first, that I do not know when this road was incorporated; I do not know, in the next place, of my own knowledge, whether the road has been built or not. In this bill we have carefully provided, however, they shall build the railroad before they will be allowed to come into this city. We provide that all rights granted to the said railroad by this act shall cease and determine, unless it shall build its road from Brandywine, in Prince George's County, Maryland, to which point the Southern Maryland road is to come, into the city of Washington. I believe that substantially answers my colleague's questions.

Mr. NEGLEY. I wish to say a word in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. NEGLEY. Let me ask the gentleman, then, whether there is provided for in this bill ample facilities for Government vessels passing in and out to the navy-yard?

Mr. HALE, of New York. The committee supposed when they provided this bridge should be built as the Secretary of the Navy required, it was all that was necessary for them to do.

Mr. NEGLEY. But the construction of the bridge and the character of the draw should be carefully guarded.

Mr. HALE, of New York. It will of course be a draw affording every facility demanded by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is evidently a draw-game on Congress. Heretofore the Committee on Commerce has had that jurisdiction over these subjects. That committee has guarded carefully the public interests by preventing all unnecessary obstructions to navigation, by providing carefully so far as the elevation of the bridge is concerned and the breadth of the span and the character of the draw.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman evidently could not have listened to the remarks which have been made explaining why the committee omitted the provision in that respect.

Mr. NEGLEY. I move to refer this bill to the Committee on Commerce, or at least that portion in reference to the draw.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois holds the floor.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. RICE. Not just now.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is quite astonishing to a new member like myself to see this desire of members to enter into a discussion wide of the mark now before us. I cannot help persuading myself the interest of the city of Washington in reference to the building of this railroad has not much to do with the discussion which is going on. I do not know whether it is a combat of intellectual people, trying to display what power they may have for defeat without regard to right or wrong. I remember what the gentleman from Pennsylvania said that the photographers are now upon the steps outside the Capitol waiting to take the pictures of these gentlemen. [Laughter.] I believe, after careful examination of two weeks, after listening to every word every man had to say—and some talked a great deal about this railroad going through the District of Columbia—I do sincerely believe that it is a proper thing to be done. There is nothing asked for that should not be asked for. It is to be for the benefit of the people. The people's interests are strictly guarded, and this House is as competent to vote yes or no on this bill to-day as it will ever be; and I hope no outside influence will be brought into this matter.

This is simply to build a railroad over the Eastern Branch of the Potomac to the northwestern boundary of the District of Columbia, under the control and supervision of tried Government officers. The question is this: Will the House permit that to be done? Shall the people of this District be permitted to profit by the building of railroads, or shall their interests, on account of jealousy or on account of any other opposing motive, be laid aside? If you do not pass this bill now, the chances are that it will never be passed.

The road is already built to the other side of the Eastern Branch. Hundreds of men are now employed on it, and carts and horses in great number are employed. The men engaged in the work are not over-rich. If they do not get the right to build in this District, they may not be able to raise the money to buy rails for the road already graded. If it is a right thing to do, let it be done now; and if the House does not want to have it done, let it say so now. I call the previous question.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask permission of the gentleman from Illinois to put a question to him.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in on page 2, line 14. If the bill is to guard the interests of the Government, whatever plan may be afterward approved of, I presume that there can be no objection to insert here in the bill, at line 14, the word "draw," so that it will read:

Thence to the side of the Eastern Branch, and crossing the same by a suitable draw-bridge and causeway, so as not to obstruct navigation, &c.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I wish to ask the gentleman a question, and I understood the gentleman yielded to me for that purpose.

Mr. RICE. I do not feel at liberty to accept any of these amendments. [Laughter.] As soon as gentlemen have done laughing they will permit me to make this observation, that this bill was read and considered at a special meeting of the committee; that every clause in it was dwelt upon, and several amendments were made. It was then put into my hands to present here for its passage. Under those circumstances, as the gentlemen belonging to the committee who have intrusted me with this bill are experienced members of this House, many of them, I beg to say that I do not feel at liberty to accept of any amendments. I want the bill to stand on its merits as it is now on the Clerk's desk.

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the gentleman allow my amendment to be read?

Mr. RICE. I will not. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEGLEY. Then I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. RICE. I prefer not to answer it. I find that it is a dangerous thing to do here. [Laughter.] I call the previous question on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to take the sense of the House on the bill as reported.

Mr. NEGLEY. Pending the motion for the previous question, I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. KILLINGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. O, no; let us get through with it to-night.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I desire to suggest an amendment.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. The gentleman from Illinois has declined to admit amendments. The question is first on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] to lay the bill on the table.

The question being put, there were—ayes 81, noes 79.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is a motion to adjourn in order now?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House adjourns now, when will this come up again?

The SPEAKER. It will come up the first thing in the morning if the House should now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will it do so, the previous question not having been seconded?

The SPEAKER. That does not matter. It goes over as unfinished business.

Mr. GARFIELD. But this is District of Columbia business, which can only be reached on the third Friday of each month.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remind the gentleman that the question of the District of Columbia business coming up as unfinished business, like anything else, was a res adjudicata some two years ago.

UNEXPENDED BALANCE OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 58) to render available a certain unexpended balance of appropriations; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 429) creating an additional land district in the Territory of New Mexico.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. POTTER. I move that when the House adjourns it be to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The House was dividing on the question of adjournment when a report was received by unanimous consent from the Committee on Appropriations. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Objection was made.

On the question of adjournment there were—ayes 118, noes 49.

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to.

And thereupon (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rules, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BRIGHT: The petition of the heirs of Bright Roberts, deceased, for relief, to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

By Mr. BURLEIGH: The petition of citizens of Portland, Maine, deprecating the issue of any more legal-tender notes, and urging a speedy return to specie payments, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee: The petition of William E. Byrd, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of Christian Hammelock, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK, of Missouri: The petition of Benoni Robion, for a pension for services in the war of 1812, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. COBURN: Papers relating to the claim of Walter D. Plowden, for compensation for services as a spy and scout, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CONGER: Papers relating to the improvement of Pine River, in Michigan, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of J. A. Hamilton, of Watrousville, Tuscola County, Michigan, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia: The petition of citizens of West Virginia, for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which made a reduction of 10 per cent. in certain duties, and also remonstrating against any increase of internal taxes and a restoration of the duty on tea and coffee, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FARWELL: The remonstrance of brewers and maltsters of Chicago, Illinois, against increasing the duty on imported hops, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts: The petition of Whiton Brothers & Co., of Boston, Massachusetts, for an American register to the American-built Peruvian steamship Rayo, which was brought into the port of Boston in a badly damaged condition, sold at private sale, and changed into a sailing vessel, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HARRISON: Papers relating to the claim of John E. Bauman & Co., for use and occupation by the United States of their mill at Nashville, Tennessee, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin: The petition of citizens of Sauk County, Wisconsin, for an appropriation for the early completion of the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. O'BRIEN: The petition of M. H. Plunkett, late second assistant engineer United States Navy, to be placed on the retired list of the Navy, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. READ: Resolutions of the Boyle County Medical Society of the State of Kentucky, in favor of the passage of the bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, resolutions of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Louisville, Kentucky, of similar import, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, resolutions of the Medical Society of Franklin County, Kentucky, of similar import, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SCOFIELD: The petition of Mrs. Mary W. Shirk, widow of the late James W. Shirk, commander United States Navy, for increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SESSIONS: The petition of citizens of Salamanca, New York, for the passage of the bill pending in Congress to authorize the Cattaraugus and Allegany Indians, in the State of New York, to lease lands, confirm leases, and quiet titles to their lands, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. STORM: The petition of citizens of Pennsylvania engaged in lumbering business on the Delaware River, for the improvement of the navigation of the Delaware River from Sandt's Eddy to Trenton, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. VANCE: The petition of citizens of Fingerville, South Carolina, for a mail-route from Spartanburgh, South Carolina, to Rutherford, North Carolina, via Poore's Ford, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. ———: The petition of Thomas W. Collins, for the incorporation of the Oxygen Gas Company of the District of Columbia, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, the petition of Franklin Lee, of Buffalo, New York, and Charles F. Dunbar, of Erie, Pennsylvania, for provision in the deficiency appropriation bill to pay them for work done under contract in the harbor of Ashtabula, Ohio, to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 21, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SHOSHONE RESERVATION, WYOMING TERRITORY.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask unanimous consent to report, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, for consideration at this time, a bill to confirm an agreement made with the Shoshone Indians, Eastern Band, for the purchase of the south part of their reservation in Wyoming Territory.

Mr. HALE. of New York. I must object, if it gives rise to debate.

Mr. SHANKS. I think it will not. I can explain in a moment the purpose of the bill. It is for the purchase of one-third of the Shoshone reservation, in Wyoming Territory. The reservation consists of 2,688,000 acres; and one-third of that reservation is to be sold to the United States for the benefit of the settlers now upon it for $25,000, to be paid at the rate of $5,000 a year. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MAYNARD. What necessity is there for bringing the bill in at this time? When will the Committee on Indian Affairs be called in its regular order?

Mr. SHANKS. The Committee on Appropriations is now perfecting the Indian appropriation bill, and it is necessary that they should have this item. For that reason, and at their request, I ask leave to introduce the bill this morning.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objections will be in order.

The bill provides that the agreement entered into on the 26th of December, 1872, between Felix R. Brunot, commissioner on the part of the United States, and the chief, head-men, and men of the Eastern Band of Shoshone Indians, shall be confirmed and approved by the Congress and President of the United States; provided that the cattle furnished under the agreement shall be good young American cattle, suitable for breeding purposes.

Mr. WOOD. I object to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. SHANKS. Then I ask that it be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No. 2104) was received, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

BIRTHDAY OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of T. N. C. Liverpool, Peter H. Clark, and other citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, asking that the anniversary of Abraham Lincoln's birthday be declared to be a legal holiday; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ANNIVERSARY OF WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that, when the House adjourns to-day, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 24th February, As the 22d of February comes on the Sabbath, it is well for us to recognize the succeeding day as the anniversary of the birth of General Washington. The civil and military authorities over the land have adopted that day as the anniversary of the birth of the Father of our country. We should commemorate the day on which that man was born "who was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 57, noes 57; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, and Mr. CRITTENDEN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 93, noes 58.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. FOSTER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 88, not voting 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Beck, Berry, Biery, Bland, Bowen, Bromberg, Brown, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cessna, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Crittenden, Crossland, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, DeWitt, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Frye, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Smith, Stephens, Strait, Strawbridge, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Tremain, Tyner, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wilber, Woodford, and Pierce M. B. Young—85.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TERRITORIAL AID TO RAILROADS, ETC.

Mr. FORT, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2105) to forbid the Territories of the United States, and the counties, cities, and towns therein, to incur indebtedness in aid of railroad companies or other private corporations; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

WASHINGTON CITY AND POINT LOOKOUT RAILROAD.

Mr. COTTON. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned yesterday the pending motion was to lay on the table a bill reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICE.] It is the bill (H. R. No. 2075) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873.* On the motion to lay the bill on the table the yeas and nays were ordered. The question now is, Will the House lay the bill on the table?

Mr. RICE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask permission of the House——

Mr. RANDALL. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table is undebatable except by unanimous consent, and debate is objected to.

Mr. RICE. I do not intend to debate the bill, but simply to make a statement of a motion which I desire to submit.

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. SPEER objected.

Mr. RICE. I wish to withdraw the motion for——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to have the orders of the House executed.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; but gentlemen are entitled to an intelligent apprehension of what the orders of the House are. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RICE] demanded the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill. Pending that demand the gentleman from Pennsylvania in front of the Chair [Mr. NEGLEY] moved that the bill lie on the table. On this motion, which is undebatable, the yeas and nays have been ordered; and the motion not being withdrawn, it is the duty of the Chair to order that the vote be taken.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 100, nays 118, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Banning, Barnum, Biery, Blount, Brown, Buffinton, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cessna, Clayton, Clements, Clymer, Stephen A. So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, said: My colleague, Mr. HENDEE, is absent on account of illness.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. RICE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw the motion I made last evening for the previous question on this bill; and I do so in order that the amendments which were mentioned by gentlemen in opposition to the bill may be presented and acted upon; and if the House should believe those amendments proper, I hope they will be adopted. There is no disposition on the part of the committee to interfere with the will of the House in this matter. I withdraw the motion for the previous question that those amendments may be offered.

I desire to say, further, that when the amendments have been presented and a sufficient time given for explanation, so that the House may understand the amendments, I shall then renew the call for the previous question, for the reason that I believe there is some important business which the House desires to transact, and I think members are now fully apprised concerning the merits of this bill, as they will be with regard to the amendments when time shall have been allowed for explanation. When such time shall have been allowed, I shall call the previous question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to move to commit this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and I will state for a moment my reasons. I think it appropriates public property; that is, it takes public property devoted to one use and applies it to another use. It ought to be discussed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is important; while, as a rule——

Mr. RICE. I hope I will be permitted to interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts. I am not acquainted with the parliamentary rules of the House, and therefore desire to know, when I have withdrawn my motion, my demand for the previous question, for the purpose of amendment being introduced, whether the question is debatable without amendment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdrawing his demand for the previous question leaves the question before the House, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time? which is debatable with or without amendment in the widest sense, and the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I was desirous simply to call the attention of the House to this fact:

This bill proposes to put a road across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, and for that purpose to build a bridge, the inevitable effect of which will be to fill up that branch and to render it unnavigable. We are already called upon to appropriate $2,000,000 to open the Potomac River, which has been filled up by the building of the Long Bridge. Now every public vessel will have to go through this bridge. If any gentleman is willing to introduce a resolution here to abolish the Washington navy-yard, I do not know but I will vote for it; but I am not willing to vote for it in this form.

Secondly, the proposed road goes near the observatory building. Anybody who knows anything about an observatory knows they have to go down to a great depth to get a foundation so as to have absolute quiet, and any jar of a train would give a parallax to Jupiter such as no astronomer ever dreamed of. [Laughter.]

Then it goes right by the Washington Monument. [Laughter.] Now, whatever we may think of the proposition to complete the building of that Washington Monument, if is there, and some time or other must be taken care of by the country.

It runs, too, between the White House and the river, as well as between the river and all the Departments. Now I wish to hear some argument to show this to be of so great advantage that we can afford to cut up this beautiful city in that way. The only advantage I have heard of from gentlemen——

Mr. RICE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. RICE. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts say it goes by the White House?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Between the White House and the river.

Mr. RICE. What is "by the White House"—a mile off?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is to run between the White House and the river, wherever these gentlemen choose to put it.

Mr. RICE. It is far from the White House to the river.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Everybody knows how far it is.

Mr. RICE. I believe it is a mile.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We know the geography of the District of Columbia tolerably well. I do not care whether it is a mile or not. The point is they are to be allowed to run this road between the White House and the river wherever they choose. Everybody knows it as well as I do. They may make a depot in front of the Treasury Department. The bill gives unlimited power.

The only advantage is we shall have a coal-road connecting with tide-water. I think we can get a coal-road from Point of Rocks and the Cumberland coal mines down to tide-water without going through the heart of the city. I think it can be done in another way. I hope it can; I believe it can. Navigation is ample here for all coal-vessels which come up. The largest coal-vessels do not draw more than nine feet of water. The Reading Railroad has an immense number for the business, and an immense number, in any view of the case, of propellers for this purpose, which draw about nine feet of water, and they can go up to Georgetown if we clean out the channel.

I do not think there is any public necessity why we should give this unlimited control to a corporation to cut through the city of Washington. We are now at immense expense to beautify this city.

This is no new thing with me. I voted against the Potomac road coming in, because they wanted to come in too far. They have now spoiled substantially any hope of completing what I had hoped in some future time would have been completed—a park, with public gardens and all that sort of thing, without a railroad passing through it and a railroad depot in the center of it. I voted against that, and I am against this for the same reason.

I do not see why the merchandise of this country should be carried through the centers of cities; and I think the feeling of the people is changed as to that, and now prefers that it should go around a city. There is no such haste about a coal-train as to make it necessary that it should go through the center of a city. I desire to see coal above all things cheap, because it is wholly upon that that Massachusetts lives—through the consumption of it by manufacturers. I desire to see it as cheap as it can be made; but everybody must see that coal-vessels, to be fitted for distributing coal in the harbors and rivers of the country, must be of light draught; and this object can be attained by the use of steamers of the size found by experience to be the best for such use. By using such vessels there can be navigation from tide-water to the Point of Rocks Railroad; and I therefore see no necessity for this road.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. If this bill is passed, will it not give to this railroad company the entire control of the river-front of Washington, so as to interfere with the business of this city?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am so told, but I have not examined that with sufficient care to know. I always try to speak to this House of what I do know, and not of what I do not. It may be so. I have not gone through that so as to be able to enlighten the House in regard to it. I have no knowledge of the subject that all the rest of the House have not. But I have thought it right to bring these things to the consideration of the House.

Gentlemen tell me that this will be done under the direction of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy. If this road is to be built, it has got to come somewhere, and all that has to be done is to find the least objectionable route within certain limits. My proposition is that it is most objectionable within the limits now proposed.

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I knew nothing about this road until yesterday, when the bill came up in the House. I did not know by what outside interest it was advocated, or anything about the corporation. I learned more than I had ever done before from friends whom I happened to meet last night. If I understand the proposition now, the road begins on the north of the city, five or six miles from here, and comes around and strikes the Baltimore and Ohio road, and, by way of the Metropolitan and Point of Rocks road—which belongs to the Baltimore and Ohio, and on which it starts—it can come in to the depot on the north side of the city. But instead of coming in on that track, it crosses the Baltimore and Ohio; crosses the Eastern Branch, and then crosses back, or perhaps keeps on the eastern side of the Eastern Branch all the time, and then crosses below the navy-yard between the navy-yard and the arsenal. It comes into the city on O street, strikes across to the Potomac River between Seventh and Eighth streets, just where most business is now done, and then follows along up the river, or "near" the river coming to the foot, or "near" the foot of the street. It is to come to the river, or "near" the river. It is very indefinite, something like the distance as to which the gentleman from Massachusetts inquired of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. RICE,] whether "near" is to mean close by, or half a mile, or a mile distant. As to that the bill is silent. Then from Eighth street the road is to come "along or near" the river to Fourteenth street. And thence the route is prescribed with wonderful particularity to Fifteenth street. It is "to proceed to a point near the southern terminus of Fifteenth street southwest." This street, as gentlemen all know, is the street on this side of the Treasury building; and there I understand is the place where they are to have a depot, right in front of the Treasury building, right in front of the President's House, and nearly in front of the new State Department building. This is the rumor; I do not know how far it is true, because the bill does not say where the depot shall be. The road then goes on and will destroy the observatory altogether. I do not know but it will destroy the navy-yard. It would very materially impair its uses, and might result in its removal. Aside from that, we have now nothing in this city almost, except its being the capital. Everybody is anxious to have some manufactures, some commerce, some kind of business, to add something to the population of the city, aside from its mere political character as the capital of the country. Now, this road will remove that navy-yard ultimately, and destroy its usefulness while it is maintained. And if it goes along by the observatory, I am told by everybody who knows anything about it that it will compel its removal. That could be done at considerable cost. The observatory might be taken over to Arlington, and I suppose that would perhaps be a very good place for it. But the construction of this railroad would compel its removal from where it is now situated.

Then the bill provides that this road shall go along by a "desirable or feasible" route—some such language as that, practically by any route which the company may choose—into Georgetown, and then through the city of Georgetown. And then, in the end, it will probably come back "to the place of beginning," as we say in deeds. This bill, however, does not provide that it shall go back there, but it may go down into Virginia. The object is undoubtedly that it shall come back to the place where it began when the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad gets the control of it, as I hope it will in time; for I think it would be better for that road to control it than to have an independent little corporation here.

This road is to come into and go through the city of Washington and the city of Georgetown. Now, in the cities of the North, where we at an early day improvidently allowed railroads to come, we have been at great expense and trouble to get them outside of the cities. By this bill it is proposed to shut off the river front of the city, and destroy all hope of future commerce here, to destroy the navy-yard in part, and the Naval Observatory in whole, and to impair the interests of the property-holders in Georgetown, and at the same time do no good to the city, because starting where they do on the Metropolitan road, they could follow that road down to the Baltimore and Ohio depot.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] makes, I understand, two objections, or rather two classes of objections, to this proposed charter.

The first is that it is indefinite in its terms, providing that it shall go "at or near" the foot of certain streets, and he says, and very unjustly says, that means that it shall go wherever the company chooses to put it. Now, if the gentleman had taken the precaution to read this bill before talking about it, he would have seen that it does not leave the company to go where it pleases, but that the committee, in reporting this bill, and specifying the general route, "at or near" certain points, have carefully provided that the precise route within those limits shall be determined by the Secretary of War. That is a very different thing from a determination by the company, as my friend from Pennsylvania cannot fail to know.

So, too, in regard to the injury that will be done to the Naval Observatory. If the gentleman had taken the precaution to read the bill he would have seen that, even in that respect, the bill is carefully guarded; that the company is prohibited from building their road where it will in any way interfere with or injure the Naval Observatory, and that by a proposed amendment that question is to be determined by the Secretary of the Navy.

I submit that gentlemen who are opposed to this bill, before they criticise its provisions, should at least pay some attention to the provisions of the bill itself, and not entirely mistake its scope and effect.

Mr. SCOFIELD. What I said about the language of the bill being "at or near" I said in passing, not laying much stress upon it. My objection was that it was proposed to allow this railroad to go through the whole city, blocking up the water-front. As to the Naval Observatory, I knew very well, for I have read the bill, because, thanks to the House adjourning last night, we had an opportunity to read the bill before the gag-law was applied to push it through. I know it provides that it shall not injure the Naval Observatory. But gentlemen who are conversant with the matter inform me that there is no opportunity for the road to pass between the Potomac and the Naval Observatory without destroying the Naval Observatory altogether. As gentlemen are well aware, the Potomac River runs comparatively near the observatory, and I am told that the road cannot run along there without destroying the observatory. To provide that the road shall go there, and then put on the condition that it shall not injure the observatory, will be about as effective as the Pope's bull against the comet.

Mr. HALE, of New York. We provide that it shall not go there except upon the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, on the ground that it will not injure the Naval Observatory. If that cannot be done, then that is an end of the matter.

Mr. SPEER. I have been informed by two gentlemen on the floor of the House, this morning, that the Secretary of the Navy says the erection of this bridge will destroy the navy-yard; and that he has never been consulted by the committee in regard to this bill; and if he had been, he would have so stated.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a question of order. I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] in regard to this bill, and therefore my point of order cannot be considered as in opposition to him. I submit that it is a breach of the privileges of this House to quote the opinions or statements of any officer of the executive department of the Government for the purpose of influencing the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that that is not in order.

Mr. SPEER. Of course the point of order lies, if made; but I did not think it would be raised under the circumstances. I will say that it seems to me that upon a bill of this moment the Secretary of the Navy should have been consulted. It is singular, to say the least of it, that this committee should have reported a bill of this character, affecting, as it does, Government interests, without first submitting it to the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War.

It seems to me that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole is eminently proper, and should be adopted by the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire only to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole that it may be fully considered and debated. There need be no haste about this matter. The same gentlemen who are moving in this enterprise have had, I am informed, a charter for another road making a connection between the Point of Rocks road and the Baltimore and Ohio road, and have disposed of the charter to the latter company. I have not a word to say against that. I am very glad they did it. But unless we can debate the question fully, I for one am not disposed to give up the power of Congress over the city of Washington into the hands of any executive officer under the hope that he will necessarily do right in the matter.

Mr. NEGLEY. The Secretary of the Navy has no officers under his command who can perform the duty of making surveys and other examinations of the channel.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. So far as concerns the purposes for which we have a navy-yard here, I know, without asking the Secretary of the Navy or anybody else, that building a bridge over as muddy a stream as the Eastern Branch will fill it up. It cannot be otherwise; especially where there is not an active commerce by propellers and other vessels to sweep out the stream. Therefore I hope the House will adopt my motion to send the bill to the Committee of the Whole, where all the amendments can be discussed, and where we cannot be shut off by the previous question from offering amendments which the gentleman in charge of this bill may not like.

Mr. RICE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question before he sits down?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. RICE. I wish to know whether the gentleman has not himself framed a bill which has been introduced into this House to build a railroad over almost this identical ground?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; I never in my life framed a railroad bill to be introduced into this House. I answer the question with great pleasure.

Mr. RICE. I thought that I had had such a bill of the gentleman's in my hands.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; I never introduced such a bill. One was shown to me, but I did not know anything about it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope this bill will be allowed to go to the Committee of the Whole. We have had one railroad cutting into our public grounds; and I hope we shall not authorize another—at any rate not without full debate.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no" on the proposition to lay this bill on the table. I did so because I do not like and never did like that way of disposing of a measure which has had the careful consideration of a committee. In so voting I did not intend to declare myself in favor of this bill.

I have understood that the Insane Asylum grounds have been almost destroyed by allowing a railroad, under the authority of Congress, to occupy the water-front there. I should not dare to vote for any railroad bill allowing such use of other parts of the water-front, without being absolutely certain myself that the experience we have already had in this matter is not to be repeated. Hence I am in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, whatever gentlemen may think about the merits of this bill, it seems to me that after the suggestions which have been made, the least that can be done with reference to the bill is to send it to the Committee of the Whole, where it may be more fully considered. I know that a number of gentlemen, who voted against laying the bill on the table, desire now to have further time to consider it before they are called upon to vote on it. I trust the chairman of the committee will assent to the reference of the bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEGLEY. My reason for making the motion to lay the bill on the table was that the gentleman having the management of it refused to permit even the reading of an amendment; and I considered that under such circumstances we should force them to some terms. This is a very important measure, one affecting the gravest interests of the Government, and I hope it will be considered in Committee of the Whole, so as to allow ample room for debate and amendment.

Mr. RICE. I have no authority to speak for the entire committee, but I will say that I have no objection whatever to the bill going to the Committee of the Whole, or anywhere else where it shall be fully investigated by the House, and decided upon its merits.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE EASTERN BRANCH.

Mr. ELDREDGE, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia a bill (H. R. No. 2106) to authorize the construction of a substantial iron bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, at or near the present Anacostia bridge; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PACKER. Mr. Speaker, I call for the consideration of the special order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PACKER] claims the floor on the bill for the restoration of the franking privilege; and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY,] chairman of the Committee on Claims, desires the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Upon this question I desire to say one word. Yesterday, as the House knows, was occupied by the Committee on the District of Columbia, after two o'clock. There were but three bills disposed of yesterday on the Private Calendar. I hope now the House will give the remainder of this day to the consideration of the bills on the Private Calendar and make some progress. There are quite one hundred bills on the Calendar. Unless we go on with private bills on Fridays and Saturdays we will never get through with them during this session.

This is private-bill day as much as Friday, and I hope the House will stand by my proposition to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar rather than take up any other business.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PACKER,] chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, can go on with that bill any time next week, while the business on the Private Calendar can only be attended to on private-bill days.

Mr. COBURN. I hope the House will agree to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois. There is a large amount of private business, and it is increasing constantly, in the hands of the committees and upon the Private Calendar in the Committee of the Whole House. There are only about two hours and a half which we will have for an entire week to work at this business. I have no doubt, although this is not as important as the franking bill, it is nevertheless of considerable importance. Private bills have received the attention of the committees of the House which have had them in charge, and I think they ought to have fair consideration by the House. The longer their consideration is put off the greater will be the number of private bills to be acted on, and the greater will be the danger of private bills having no merit getting through the House in the hurry and confusion of the last days of the session. I hope the House will not lose this opportunity and the opportunity we have every week on private bill-days to examine into these private claims. The only way that can be done effectually is to give time for their consideration. If we go to other business to-day we will give only a few hours next week.

Mr. PACKER. If the House will remember, although the bill to which I have called the attention of the House was made a special order for last Friday, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads gave way—recognizing the importance of acting on private bills on private-bill days. I think it is important for us to dispose of the franking bill, which is the special order, before we adjourn to-day.

Mr. RANDALL. If I understand the position of the franking bill, it stands in the way of everything else, and ought to be disposed of, so that other matters of public business may be considered. Is this private-bill day?

The SPEAKER. Saturday is private-bill day, the same as Friday; but the House is less familiar with that fact, so few sessions are held on Saturdays.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will make a suggestion. But a small percentage of private bills will ever get through under the present system. It is therefore a matter of little consequence to private claimants whether we consider only three or four per cent. of them or not; because we will have to adopt some other mode, some more efficacious method of disposing of the business than that we now have. I think we had better agree to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and get his car-load of books out of the way as soon as possible.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The same argument may be made in reference to any other bill in the House.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 64.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. PACKER, and Mr. HAWLEY of Illinois, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 63.

So the motion was agreed to.

ABEL W. LEWIS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SAYLER] desires to withdraw from the files of the House all the papers, except the report of the committee, in the case of Abel W. Lewis last before the Committee on Claims, which the committee reported back adversely. No objection is made by the chairman of the committee or the member who made the report. If there be no objection the request will be granted.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 493) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Arkansas; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence, by unanimous consent, was granted to Mr. SHELDON for ten days, on account of a death in his family; and also to Mr. STORM, for ten days.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE WACHUSETT.

On motion of Mr. MYERS, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the memorial of Commodore Collins, for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States steamer Wachusett, reported adversely by the Committee on Naval Affairs; and it was recommitted to the same committee.

IMPORTATION AND COINAGE OF GOLD.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2107) to encourage the importation and coinage of gold; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEYS ON UPPER MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of February 13, 1874, in relation to the surveys made on the Upper Mississippi River, between Minneapolis and Saint Cloud; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PROCEEDS OF CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of January 16, 1874, in relation to the amount of money paid into the Treasury of the United States arising from cotton and other captured and abandoned property; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

YELLOWSTONE PUBLIC PARK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draught of an act amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to set apart a certain tract of land, lying near the head-waters of the Yellowstone River, as a public park;" which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

LOST ARMY CLOTHING.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to clothing lost by the enlisted men of Company F, Third United States Cavalry, during the flood in Blackwood Valley, on May 31, 1873; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL SAVINGS-BANK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the treasurer of the National Savings-Bank, transmitting his annual statement of said bank for the year ending December 31, 1873, in compliance with the act of May 24, 1870; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

EASTERN AND WESTERN TRANSPORTATION COMPANY.

Mr. HURLBUT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2108) to incorporate the Eastern and Western Transportation Company; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Railways and Canals, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

AMERICAN SHIP TRANSPORTATION ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HURLBUT also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported back the memorial of the American Ship Transportation Association; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the same committee.

LOUISVILLE CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. STANDEFORD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No 2109) for the protection of the United States custom-house in the city of Louisville, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

COMMERCE WITH FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Mr. WHEELER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in compliance with the acts of August 16, 1842, and August 18, 1856, a report upon the commercial relations of the United States with foreign countries for the year ending September 30, 1873; and moved that the same be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce, for reference to the Committee on Railways and Canals, a bill for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Mr. CONGER. That bill should go to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STONE. I submit that the proper reference is to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The SPEAKER. That depends on where the papers heretofore presented relating to this subject now are. There is no necessity for having the same subject before two separate committees.

Mr. CONGER. All the papers regarding the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi have been referred to the Committee on Commerce. All papers relating to the Saint Philip Canal have been referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals. I understand that this bill relates to the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Mr. STONE. I desire to have the bill referred under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill can only be introduced and referred by unanimous consent; and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] objects.

Mr. STONE. I withdraw the bill.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS, ETC.

Mr. STORM. I desire to give notice that I shall offer, when in order, the following amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 825) in relation to the distribution of public documents, &c.:

Strike out of the bill all the sections except the third.

Mr. BUCKNER. I also desire to give notice of an amendment to the same bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have it printed?

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not.

The SPEAKER. Then there is no necessity for introducing it now.

DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS AND PRINTED DOCUMENTS.

Mr. HAYS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2110) to provide for the distribution of seeds and printed documents by the Agricultural Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The House then pursuant to order, resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. ORTH in the chair.)

JAMES DE LONG.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 526) for the relief of James DeLong.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be passed.

HENRY S. WELLES.

The next business upon the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1759) for the relief of Henry S. Welles.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to pay Henry S. Welles $193,132.96, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for expenditures made by him under his contracts of May 1 and July 5, 1866, for removing obstructions from the Savannah River, and improving the harbor, prior to the date of the annullment of said contracts by the Secretary of the Treasury, being the amount found due in the settlement of his account as authorized by the Secretary of War.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the bill by striking out at the close the words "being the amount found due in the settlement of his accounts as authorized by the Secretary of War," and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "which said sum shall be in full satisfaction to said Welles for all claims referred to in the report and recommendation of the Secretary of War."

I desire to state briefly the character and object of this bill. The amendment which I have proposed is merely verbal, making the more distinct the purpose of the bill. The report which will be read to the House will show that shortly after the war the Secretary of the Treasury entered into acontract with Mr. Welles to remove obstructions in the river at Savannah, Georgia, in order to enable the commerce of that place to be carried on by the river. By the contract Mr. Welles was to receive as compensation for the removal of such obstructions certain property which had been sunk in the river during the war to prevent any vessel from coming up the river and attacking the city of Savannah. Mr. Welles gave to the Government a bond of $50,000 for the performance of his part of the contract.

The contract continued for some four years, with an expenditure on the part of Mr. Welles, in money, labor, and material, amounting to about $250,000. During that time he received as compensation, from the sales of the property recovered, sunken vessels and things of that description, the sum of $40,000. Just at the time when the main obstructions in the harbor had been removed, and navigation had been opened to the city, before Mr. Welles had yet reached any of the sunken vessels which contained iron and other valuable material, from which he was to receive his compensation, the legal officers of the Government notified the then Secretary of the Treasury that this contract, which had been made by Mr. McCulloch, the former Secretary of the Treasury, had no authority of law, and that it must be annulled; consequently the contract was annulled, and Mr. Welles, while in the performance of it, with all the material on hand for fulfilling the contract, with his vessels, steamboat, diving apparatus, rafts, and floats, was compelled, at a moment's notice, to stop his work. He had received, as compensation for the expenditure of $250,000, only the $40,000 mentioned in the report.

I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to say to the House, after a careful investigation of this subject, that the work performed by Mr. Welles was of that character which the Committee on Commerce, under the recommendation of the Engineer Department, have provided for being performed upon other harbors ever since the war closed, making appropriations of money out of the Treasury for that purpose. Since this contract was closed, the first year after it was annulled, the Committee on Commerce in their bill for river and harbor appropriations reported $50,000 to continue the work. And in their last bill another $50,000 was appropriated to continue the work which had been commenced and carried on by Mr. Welles. And the Committee on Commerce this year, under the recommendation of the Engineer Department, will ask the House to make a still further appropriation to complete and finish that work.

Mr. HOLMAN. As the Committee on Commerce have largely predicated their recommendations in reference to this case upon the report made by the engineer having charge of this work, I would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that a few paragraphs of the report of that engineer should be submitted to the committee, so that the basis of the action of the Committee on Commerce may be known to the House.

Mr. CONGER. I propose to have the report read—the whole of it. I desired, however, as this bill recommends the appropriation of $193,000, to bespeak in advance of the reading of the report the attention of members to it, so that when it shall be read (and I believe it contains a full statement of the case in all its details) it will receive the attention of every member of the committee. Therefore, if they will listen to the reading of the report, they will see what is the character of the bill, and what appropriation is required, and will be able to decide upon its justness and propriety. It was for that reason, and that only, that I sought to make a few introductory remarks before I asked the Clerk to read the report of the Committee on Commerce on this bill, which I now send to his desk.

The Clerk read the report, which was as follows:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 823) "to provide payment for clearing the river and harbor of Savannah, Georgia, of obstructions during the years 18 and 18 , together with the accompanying petition of Mr. Henry S. Welles, and contracts of the Secretary of the Treasury with said Welles, letter of the Secretary of the Treasury annulling said contracts, and Executive Document No. 123, Fortieth Congress, second session; also, correspondence of the Secretary of the Treasury with Mr. Welles and other parties, together with report of the Secretary of the Treasury and report of the Secretary of War in answer to a call for information from the Committee on Commerce of the Senate of the United States in reference to said petition, respectfully report:

That in May, 1866, the Secretary of the Treasury made a contract with Henry S. Welles, and in July following said contract was modified.

The contract was for removing certain artificial obstructions placed in the river and harbor of Savannah, Georgia, to prevent vessels of the United States from approaching the city of Savannah, and consisted of sunken vessels, a floating dry-dock sunk, cribs filled with stone and bricks, &c.

These obstructions are shown upon a Coast Survey chart made in 1865 by the United States.

Mr. Welles proceeded to fulfill the conditions of his contract, and gave bonds in the sum of $50,000 for faithful performance of the same, and continued until January, 1870, when the Secretary of the Treasury, without notice and without claiming any failure upon the part of Mr. Welles, but solely because the law officers of his Department advised him there was no authority upon the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to make such contracts, annulled the contract.

By the terms of the contract Mr. Welles was to receive his pay from the proceeds of the materials recovered from such obstructions.

He was compelled by the exigencies of commerce and correspondence of the Secretary of the Treasury and his agents to confine his efforts to the opening and widening of the main channel, and not allowed to take up the dry-dock and the iron-clad vessels that did not lie directly in the main channel, which at that time were of great value if they were raised, and he was so kept at work in the main channel until the annulment of the contract, in January, 1870.

Thus, from an error in or want of authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, and from other reasons hereafter referred to in the report from the War Department, Mr. Welles has become a great loser, while the Government are the gainers by his losses.

Mr. Welles, under this state of the case, with no contract, had no other recourse but an appeal to Congress, setting forth his expenses and receipts under the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury, and ask payment for actual expenses and disbursements. He applied by petition to Congress in December, 1872, and his petition was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury by the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate; and the following report from the Secretary of the Treasury was received by said Senate committee:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1873.

SIR: It appears from the records of this Department that on the 1st day of May and the 5th day of July, 1866, two contracts were made by the Secretary of the Treasury, acting under the captured and abandoned property acts, with one Henry S. Welles, to remove the following wrecked property:

1st. The wreck known as the Savannah.
2d. The wreck known as the Ogeechee.
3d. The wreck known as the Georgia, or the ladies' gun-boat.
4th. The wrecks of vessels sunk below the obstructions.
5th. The dry-dock sunk in Saint Augustine's Creek.
6th. The wrecks sunk near Fort Pulaski; and such other wrecked vessels as may be discovered in and near the river and harbor of Savannah. And also to remove all cribs, piles, boats, scows, vessels, and other property that obstruct the channel of the Savannah River.

And that said contracts were annulled by me on the 18th day of January, 1870.

If Mr. Welles has expended more than he has received for improving the harbor under his contracts, I know of no authority to adjust and pay the same, except the authority be granted by Congress.

In this connection, I transmit herewith Executive Document No. 123, Fortieth Congress, second session, being a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives relative to obstructions in the Savannah River.

The petition inclosed with your letter of the 24th ultimo is returned herewith.

Very respectfully,

GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. Z. CHANDLER,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

Whereupon the said Committee on Commerce of the Senate reported a bill unanimously to pay Mr. Welles. The said Senate committee also sent said petition to the Secretary of War for a report, and during the interval of time between the last Congress and the present the War Department have given the matter full and careful consideration and investigation, and adjusted the amount due Mr. Welles, and made the following report and recommendation:

[Senate Executive Document No. 5, Forty-second Congress, first session.]

Letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, in relation to the application of Henry S. Welles for compensation for removing obstructions from the harbor of Savannah, Georgia.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 8, 1873.

SIR: In response to the letter of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, dated January 16, 1873, inclosing the petition of Henry S. Welles, praying compensation for removing obstructions from the harbor of Savannah, Georgia, and requesting information in relation to the matter, I have the honor, in the absence of the Secretary of War and by his direction, to transmit letter of the Chief of Engineers of the 4th instant, inclosing copy of report of Major Q. A. Gillmore, Corps of Engineers, the officer in charge of the improvement of Savannah Harbor, dated November 14, 1873, and accompanying papers.

Major Gillmore was prevented by absence on other duty from giving the subject of Mr. Welles's petition the attention it seemed to demand prior to the adjournment of Congress.

The report now transmitted, it is believed, will furnish all the information desired by the committee.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. T. CROSBY,
Chief Clerk.

The PRESIDENT United States Senate.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, D. C., December 4, 1873.

SIR: The letter of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate of the United States, dated January 16, 1873, inclosing petition of Henry S. Welles, for compensation for removing obstructions from the harbor of Savannah, and requesting information, &c., referred to this office for report, is herewith respectfully returned.

The letter was referred to Major Q. A. Gillmore, Corps of Engineers, the officer in charge of the improvement of Savannah Harbor, and a copy of his report thereon, dated November 10, 1873, is hereby submitted.

Major Gillmore appears to have given the subject close attention, and it is believed that his report will furnish all the information desired by the committee.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General and Chief of Engineers.

Hon. W. W. BELKNAP, Secretary of War.

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE,
New York, November 10, 1873.

GENERAL: I have the honor to return herewith the papers relating to the petition of Henry S. Welles for compensation for removing wrecks and obstructions from the Savannah River, Georgia, under his contracts with the Treasury Department, which papers were referred to me for report January 22, 1873.

Owing to my absence at the time on duty in the South, and my consequent inability to obtain access to Mr. Welles's records and accounts, it was impracticable for me to give the subject the attention it seemed to demand and render a report before the adjournment of Congress.

Attention is respectfully invited to the papers herewith transmitted. The "extracts" and "copies" I have compared with the original papers in Mr. Welles's possesssion, and have found them to be correct.

1. Printed memorial, (marked A,) containing copies of original contracts, dated May 1, 1866, and July 5, 1866, and copy of original letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated January 18, 1870, declaring said contracts null and void.

2. Printed "brief," (marked B,) containing extracts from the correspondence between Mr. Welles and the Secretary of the Treasury, and from the reports of the agents appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to make inspections from time to time during the progress of the removal of the obstructions.

3. House Executive Document No. 123, (marked C,) being a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House relative to the obstructions in the Savannah River.

4. Letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated February 4, 1873, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, (marked D.)

5. Printed statement (marked E) of Mr. Welles's expenditures, in detail, accompanied by the affidavit and certificates of his superintendents and extracts from the accounts rendered by them to Mr. Welles, showing the earnings of the wrecking equipment and proceeds of sales of materials recovered.

From these papers it would appear that Mr. Welles entered into contracts with the Treasury Department to remove certain designated wrecks, cribs, and other sunken obstructions from the Savannah River, and that these contracts were based upon the Coast Survey chart, made in December, 1865. This chart shows nine vessels to be removed, besides the dry-dock and single line of sixteen cribs at the main line at the head of Elba Island. I know, from personal observation, that there was a double line of cribs at this point, and that there had been removed forty cribs in all, most of them being from this main line of obstructions. Twelve cribs remained when Mr. Welles's contract was annulled, January 18, 1870, which have been removed under my supervision within the past year.

In addition to the forty cribs, I am convinced by personal observation and investigation that about one hundred and fifty piles, many iron-shod snags, and a number of torpedoes, were taken from the channel by the contractor.

Instead of nine vessels, as shown on the Coast Survey chart, from twenty-seven to thirty were sunk at different points in the river. Mr. Welles removed over twenty of these, and seven remained to be removed when his contract was annulled.

In effecting the removal of these obstructions Mr. Welles claims to have expended $233,235.73, this amount being charged in detail in the printed account of expenditures marked E.

In support of this claim Mr. Welles presents his labor receipt-books, his accounts-current, as rendered by his superintendent, Mr. Willink, and the affidavit of Mr. Willink and certificates of Mr. Woodward.

The books and accounts have been carefully examined, and I find that the monthly accounts for labor agree with the charges in the printed statement. Superintendent Woodward appears to have taken proper receipts for all amounts paid by him on this account, but under Mr. Willink's superintendence no signatures were taken in the time-book, possibly for the reason that but few of the employés could write. From my personal knowledge of the amount of work done, I feel satisfied that in this particular the account is correct.

The charges for the subsistence of employés I believe to be reasonable. The charge for "wrecking equipment," which forms so large a proportion of the aggregate, I have not been able to verify from any accounts in Mr. Welles's possession. These accounts, it is claimed, were lost with the wrecking steamer when that vessel was sunk. Considering, however, that the employés were constantly required to work extra time, the wages paid them appear to be reasonable, and the value of the use of the steamer, lifting vessels, lighters, diving apparatus, &c., seems to be fairly estimated. Mr. Woodward's certificate and the affidavit of Mr. Willink on these points are submitted with the printed account of expenditures marked E. Both Mr. Woodward and Mr. Willink are personally known to me, and are regarded as good authority.

Attached to this account, also, is a statement of the several amounts received for relieving vessels in distress, and from sales of materials recovered, aggregating $40,102.77. These figures are obtained from original accounts-current with which I have compared them and found them to agree.

The correspondence between the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Welles indicates that the exigencies of commerce, as stated by the pilot commissioners and city authorities of Savannah, ship-masters, and others, required the removal of the cribs, wrecks, and piles at and near the main line of obstructions at Four-Mile Point. The contractor appears to have carried on his operations in obedience to the orders of the Secretary, and to have first devoted his attention to the removal of the wrecks and cribs which seriously obstructed the channel.

In my opinion, if Mr. Welles had been required to remove only those wrecks and cribs shown upon the Coast Survey chart, the proceeds of the wreck of the dry-dock and the iron-clads Georgia and Savannah would have afforded him a considerable profit on the entire work. Or, if he had been permitted to complete his contract, the proceeds of these wrecks would have enabled him to reimburse himself largely for his expenditures on the other more serious, but, to him, comparatively valueless obstructions. That they were of little value is shown by the remonstrance of the mayor and city council of Savannah, referred to in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, (printed document marked C,) herewith transmitted, page 17.

The facts of the case seem to be that, in executing in good faith a contract, the existence of which was known to Congress, as well as to the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and therefore a presumably legal one, Mr. Welles accomplished an important public improvement at a heavy personal cost. No default, on his part, is alleged. The annulment of his contract, before he had taken up the most valuable of the wrecks, deprived him of the only legitimate means he possessed under it to reimburse himself for money actually expended by him. In addition, I deem it at least questionable whether the same work could have been done by the United States at that time, under the contract system or otherwise, at a less cost than that incurred by Mr. Welles.

I therefore consider his claim for $250,000 a just one, and recommend its payment.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Q. A. GILLMORE,
Major of Engineers, Brevet Major-General, U. S. A.

Brig. Gen. A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers U. S. A., Washington, D. C.

Your committee further report:

Congress would have been compelled to have made appropriations to open this channel of commerce, and have made appropriations since the annulment of this contract to the amount of $100,000, to proceed with the work, and new appropriations are annually granted by Congress for the same kinds of works performed by Mr. Welles for the benefit of commerce and navigation.

In view of all the facts and investigation, this committee report favorably, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. CONGER. I have but one word further to say, unless some further inquiries be made. This matter was referred to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury, that they might state, so far as possible, the account between the parties. The report of those officers is embraced in the document just read. It shows that, including interest upon the money and the allowance for Mr. Welles's personal services, the sum of $250,000 would be a reasonable allowance. The committee, however, thought that they would allow Mr. Welles $193,132.96, which is the amount found due, without any allowance of interest and without any allowance for his personal services. It merely covers his actual expenditures in the service of the Government. The whole amount of those expenditures would have been $233,000; but we deduct from that $40,000, which he received as the value of property sold by the Government after being raised by him from the wrecks in the river. I repeat, that the amount proposed to be allowed by the committee covers merely the actual expenditures of Mr. Welles, without any allowance for interest or for his personal services. The committee were, I think, unanimous in reporting in favor of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

JOHN T. WATSON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1271) for the relief of John T. Watson, of Cincinnati, Ohio.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John T. Watson, of Cincinnati, Ohio, the sum of $3,962, in full compensation for his expenditures and losses in rescuing United States officers and soldiers from the disaster of the steamboat Sultana, destroyed by fire on the night of April 26, 1865, on the Mississippi River.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this bill was reported from the Committee on War Claims by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] who is now absent, and who desired me to have it laid over until next Friday.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think that course is not necessary. The matter can be explained by my colleague, [Mr. SAYLER.]

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I hope the bill will not be laid over, but acted on to-day.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I merely expressed the wish of the gentleman from Connecticut. If the gentleman from Ohio can make the necessary explanation, I do not of course make any objection.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I introduced this bill, and have had a perfect understanding with the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] with regard to it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred bill H. R. No. 1271, for the relief of Captain John T. Watson, of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying compensation for expenditures and losses in rescuing United States soldiers from a steamboat disaster by fire on the Mississippi River, on the night of the 26th of April, 1865, make the following report:

The claimant was the owner and master of the passenger-steamer Bostona, of four hundred and fifty tons burden, navigating the Mississippi and its tributaries, newly repaired and furnished in 1865, and insured for $25,000.

During said night the Bostona, with officers, crew, and passengers, fully freighted, and commanded by the claimant, when off sixteen miles from Memphis, on her regular trip from Cincinnati to Vicksburgh, discovered the steamer Sultana on fire near the Arkansas shore. The claimant directed his steamer to the relief of the burning vessel, which had collapsed a flue, was burning to the water's edge, and endangering the lives of two thousand soldiers, who had very improperly been furnished transportation by this boat at Vicksburgh.

For the next thirty-six hours the Bostona was engaged in rescuing these soldiers, ministering to them and taking them into hospital at Memphis. There were saved, by the humane efforts of Captain Watson, about three hundred and fifty officers and men. These sufferers were in all stages of sickness and exhaustion, and nothing was withheld by the claimant for their preservation and comfort.

A particular account of the disaster and of the conduct of the Bostona is properly related, under oath, by Mr. Ames Fisher, the clerk of the boat, and a man of character and reputation. Mr. Fisher states:

"Very soon after midnight on the morning of April 27, we saw a steamboat on fire in the river below us; we were then, I suppose, a dozen or fifteen miles above Memphis, bound down the river with a cargo of freight and a few passengers; the Bostona was run near the burning steamboat; we found that she was the Sultana; the water for a long distance all around her was as light as day, and thickly dotted with heads of human beings; we all set to work to try to save as many as we could. I learned from some of those saved, that there were about twenty-two hundred people on the Sultana when she took fire, and that most of them were exchanged Federal prisoners, that had been taken on the Sultana at Vicksburgh. The Bostona first floated down with the current, and everybody on her tried to save the drowning men; I myself took off several doors and shutters and threw them to persons in the water; a great deal of loose stuff was thrown overboard; when we could see a chance to save a man's life we threw him anything we could get hold of; a little after daylight we had floated down to Memphis; as fast as we got the men out of the water we helped them into the cabin, gave them a glass of spirits and some hot coffee; we put some into the state-rooms and others on the cabin floor; some were badly scalded and mangled; Mr. Stephens and some other persons bandaged the scalded men with flour and water to keep the air from their burns; all of them, I believe, were as well taken care of as circumstances would permit; when they came to be taken on shore at Memphis they took with them a great deal of bedding, for covering, as most of them were almost entirely naked when we took them out of the water; they took sheets and comforts and blankets; and a great many of the badly scalded and bruised were carried ashore on mattresses; as soon as we landed them all, we went immediately back up the river again to pick up any that might be lodged on jams of drift-wood, or in the bushes on the shore, the water at the time being over the banks; we got back to Memphis a little after noon, and discharged our second load; I think we must have saved some three or four hundred in all.

"The Bostona lost a great deal in the shape of doors, blinds, staging-planks, bucket planks, wood, hay-bales, rigging cut up, &c., &c.; also, in damage to the cabin carpet and furniture; also, in mattresses, pillows, and bed-clothes; the mattresses were all cotton mattresses, I think; the boat's furniture was new, and cotton was very high; I do not think any bedding that was taken ashore was ever brought back; the men that could eat were fed; and when we got through with landing the last of the men, the Bostona was not in a fit condition to proceed on her voyage, and Memphis is a very slow place to fit and repair a boat.

"The Bostona herself was burned some eight or nine months afterward, and all my bills and books were destroyed by the fire, otherwise I could tell very nearly what money was expended in refitting at Memphis and getting the boat ready to leave port again. There were also destroyed by the burning of the Bostona a great many bills of stores, furniture, &c., that had been put on the Bostona at Cincinnati, in refitting her for the season's business, shortly prior to her starting on this trip. I cannot give a very good estimate from memory of the value of things lost and expended in rescuing those men from the Sultana, but I give approximately some of the items of loss. The Bostona lay in Memphis after the accident not less than seven days."

The claimant estimate his expenses in this transaction at $5,437.20, and applied to the staff-officers of General Washburn, commanding at Memphis, for payment; but they declined for want of authority to make such a disbursement, and being in good pecuniary circumstances then, he took no further steps toward collecting his claim.

Since that time, however the claimant has become bankrupt by the total loss of his property in the destruction of his own steamboat, and is now broken down in health, unable to labor for a livelihood, and, therefore, asks for the payment of this claim.

In consideration of these facts, the committee are of opinion that they ought to recommend the appropriation of a reasonable sum, in recognition and payment of these services, and do recommend the sum of $3,962, and for that purpose report back the bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

EDWARD SAVAGE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1763) to permit Edward Savage, of Minnesota, to enter one quarter-section of the public lands, or any legal subdivision of the same.

The bill was read. It authorizes and allows Edward Savage, of Minnesota, to enter one quarter-section of the public lands within the State of Minnesota, or any legal subdivision of the same, under the general or soldiers' homestead law, or under the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act to encourage the growth of timber on western prairies."

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

EPHRAIM P. SHOWALTER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1768) for the relief of Ephraim P. Showalter.

The bill was read. It recites in the preamble that Ephraim P. Showalter was drafted into the service of the United States on the 26th day of September, 1864, for the period of one year; and on the 18th day of November, 1864, was mustered into the service of the United States, in Company D, Thirtieth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry; that on or about the 2d day of December, 1864, he furnished, and caused to be mustered into the service of the United States, a substitute for two years, paying therefor the sum of $1,000; that notwithstanding the furnishing of this substitute he was held to service until the 23d day of June, 1865. The bill therefore authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Showalter the sum of $500, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which is to be in full for his claim for said substitute.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

ISSUE OF CLOTHING TO ENLISTED MEN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the issue of clothing to certain enlisted men of the Army.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the Secretary of War to issue to the enlisted men of Company I, Second Regiment United States Cavalry; Company H, Ninth Regiment United States Infantry; and Company E, Third Regiment United States Cavalry, clothing in lieu of, and equal in amount to, that lost by them or rendered unfit for further use by their efforts to extinguish and prevent the spread of the fire which occurred at Fort Sanders, Wyoming Territory, on the 23d day of April, 1873, as shown and recommended in the report of the board of survey.

The bill was laid aside,to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

LUCIUS A. ROUNTREE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 363) for the relief of Lucius A. Rountree.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretery of War to cause to be paid to Lucius A. Rountree the full pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant of infantry of Company A, Forty-sixth Regiment of Missouri Volunteers, from the 13th day of September, 1864, to the 3d day of December, 1864, deducting therefrom any amount he may have received, as an enlisted man, during the time specified.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

JAMES LONG.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 368) for the relief of James Long.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be paid to James Long the full pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of infantry of Company A, Forty-sixth Regiment of Missouri Volunteers, from the 13th day of September, 1864, to the 3d day of December, 1864, deducting therefrom any amount he may have received as an enlisted man during the time specified.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

WILLIAM E. CHILDS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1779) for the relief of William E. Childs.

The bill was read. It recites in the preamble that a commission as first lieutenant was issued by the governor of Ohio, on January 18, 1865, for William E. Childs, a hospital steward in the Fifty-fifth Regiment Ohio Veteran Volunteers; that Childs, by reason of being on duty with his regiment in General Sherman's campaign, from Savannah, Georgia, to Goldsborough, North Carolina, from January 10, 1865, to March 20, 1865, was unable to receive his commission and be mustered as a commissioned officer until March 25, 1865, and failed to come under the provision of the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1865. The bill therefore directs the Paymaster-General to pay to William E. Childs, out of any money appropriated for the pay of the Army, the three months' pay proper of a first lieutenant of infantry provided by the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1865, the same as if he had been mustered at the date of the passage of said act.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAPTAIN A. B. DYER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 498) to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer.

The bill was read. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow Captain A. B. Dyer, now brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance, in settling his accounts, the sum of $9,853.42, and such outstanding checks as may hereafter be paid by the Treasury Department and charged to his account, the whole not to exceed the sum of $11,709.29, that being the amount deposited to his credit in the United States depository at Norfolk, Virginia, in April, 1861, as certified by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and transferred by the depository to the rebel authorities at Richmond.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 498) for the relief of Captain A. B. Dyer, present the following report:

From the testimony presented to the committee it is shown that the claimant, in the spring of 1861, was in command of the Fort Monroe arsenal, and charged with the disbursement of public moneys on its account, part of which public moneys had been placed to his credit by the Treasury Department with the depositary at Norfolk, Virginia; that he used all proper endeavors to withdraw this money, and that his action in the premises was approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Treasury.

From the reports on file in the Treasury Department it is shown that, on April 13, 1861, the sum of $11,709.29 was to the credit of his disbursing account on the books of the depositary at Norfolk.

The amount mentioned in the joint resolution for his relief which passed the House of Representatives on January 16, 1866, was $9,778.42, as shown by his check-book, but since that date an outstanding check for seventy-five dollars has been paid by the Treasury Department and charged to him, making the amount charged against him on the books of the Treasury $9,853.42.

The committee are satisfied; by the proofs in the case, that he is entitled to the relief asked for, and report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand this bill proposes to allow this officer $9,853; yet the report which has been read states that a bill was passed by this House in a former Congress to pay all of this claim except seventy-five dollars. Perhaps some gentleman can explain this matter. Possibly the bill which passed the House may have been rejected by the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. YOUNG] can, I presume, explain this matter.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. This bill is recommended by all the Departments of the Government having any official connection with the matter. The Secretary of War, the Adjutant-General, and the Auditor having jurisdiction of this question have all approved the claim. Testimony is on file showing that the money for which this man asks to be allowed was in his possession as disbursing officer at Fortress Monroe; and by an act of the Virginia convention he was not allowed to pay it over to any United States officer. That amount is now charged to the account of Captain Dyer, who is, I believe, in very needy circumstances and is now supposed to be on his death-bed. He can never pay the amount which is thus charged against him. If we refuse to pass this bill the amount thus charged against him will simply stand unpaid indefinitely. He has been asking this measure of relief for nine years; and it is a disgrace to the Government that relief has not been granted before.

Mr. HOLMAN. The fact that the granting of relief in this case is recommended by the War Department is not stated in the report. If the War Department recommends Congress to allow this credit in favor of this officer, it would furnish perhaps an unanswerable argument in favor or the bill. This loss was sustained a number of years ago, and accounts of this kind have generally been long since adjusted.

If there is any recommendation from the War Department in favor of this claim, that this should be adjusted and the credit given to General Dyer, it is desirable to have it before the House.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I have already stated that the Ordnance Office, as well as the Secretary of War, has recommended the passage of this bill. It ought to have been passed long ago, and would have been if General Dyer had been able to attend to the business; but he has been so seriously ill as to be confined to his bed for a long period of time. A bill did pass this House for his relief, and was sent to the Senate. There is no doubt this is a just case, and this bill ought to be passed at once.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall not make further objection; but more information seems to me would be desirable, if it could be obtained before final action was taken on this bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. It is all right. I have looked into it and examined all the facts.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN N. NEWMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 622) for the relief of John N. Newman, late an acting first lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of War be, and he is thereby, authorized and directed to place the name of John N. Newman on the rolls as first lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, from August 15, 1863, to February 2, 1864; and that the proper accounting and pay officers of the Government shall allow and pay to said Newman the pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant of cavalry during the said time, deducting any sum or sums he may have received on account of military service during the said period.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

It appears from the report, which was read, that the evidence on file shows that John N. Newman, the petitioner, served as a first lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Tennessee Calvary, from the 15th day of August, 1863, to the 2d day of February, 1864; that he was recognized by his superior officers and the men as such officer during the time aforesaid, and performed all the duties and incurred all the expense of such office. The proof on file shows, further, that this company was mustered in on the said 15th day of August, 1863, and Thomas S. Northern was commissioned as second lieutenant; and this petitioner, as first lieutenant of the company, is borne upon the rolls as "absent on recruiting service;" and no commission issued, nor was there any mustered first lieutenant of said company, nor any other person acting and performing the duties of first lieutenant, until the said 2d day of February, 1864. The committee are therefore of opinion that the said John N. Newman is entitled to the pay and emoluments of a first lieutenant of calvary from the 15th day of August, 1863, to the 2d day of February, 1864, and recommend the passage of this bill.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JONATHAN L. MANN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1770) for the relief of Jonathan L. Mann, late a chaplain in the volunteer service of the Army.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Adjutant-General of the United States Army be, and he is thereby, directed to muster back Jonathan L. Mann, chaplain Ninth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, to October 28, 1863; and that the Paymaster-General of the United States Army is thereby directed to pay to Jonathan L. Mann, late chaplain Ninth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, out of any money appropriated, or that may be appropriated, for the pay of the Army, the full pay and emoluments of a chaplain of volunteer cavalry in the Army of the United States, from the 28th day of October, 1863, to March 24, 1865, deducting therefrom any sum received by him for services rendered during said period in the Army of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the report.

It appears from the report, which was read, that on the 28th of October, 1863, he was appointed by the colonel of the Ninth Tennessee Cavalry chaplain of the regiment, and went on duty as such, and so continued until the 24th day of March, 1865, at which time the regiment was consolidated with the Eleventh Tennessee Cavalry.

The regiment was not organized until the latter part of September, 1864, and on the 25th of September, 1864, he was commissioned chaplain by the governor of Tennessee. On the 26th of November, 1864, the officers of the regiment sent a petition to the Secretary of War asking that the date of his muster as chaplain be fixed on the 28th of October, 1863, on the ground that he had "faithfully discharged the duties of chaplain in this regiment from that date up to the date of the petition, without any kind of pay, emoluments, or compensation whatever."

It is a matter of history, as well as proof in the case, that the organization of the regiment was delayed from month to month until the 25th of September, 1864, when it was completed. The chaplain was not at fault for this delay, but did his duty, which was just as onerous under the circumstances as if the regiment had been organized fully. His presence with the troops, his absence from home, his faithful service, and the irregularities attending the organization of Tennessee Union regiments in a State afflicted with rebellion, are matters of fact that give great strength to the claim of Chaplain Mann. It was impossible to organize regiments of Tennessecans during the rebellion with the ease, regularity, and precision with which they were enlisted and mustered in the Northern States. And the officers who went forward to do this work in that State deserve full and ample pay for their time and services, given under circumstances more trying and hazardous than those surrounding the men who have been paid for their entire term of service, because of the facility with which their commands were organized.

The committee are of opinion that he should be mustered back to the date fixed by the officers of the regiment, and paid accordingly, and have ordered that a bill be reported to that effect.

Mr. HOLMAN. If I understand this paper correctly, Mr. Chairman, the organization of this regiment was completed September 25, 1864.

Mr. THORNBURGH. It was not fully organized until the 25th of September, 1864. The organization of the regiment was delayed to the 25th of September, 1864, because there were thirty-two or thirty-four men lacking to make up the number required for a regiment.

Mr. HOLMAN. The paper states the regiment was not organized until September, 1864.

Mr. THORNBURGH. The colonel and other officers of the regiment were appointed a long while before that, and the proof shows that on the 28th of October Jonathan L. Mann, of Knoxville, Tennessee, was appointed by the colonel of the Ninth Tennessee Cavalry chaplain of the regiment, and went on duty as such, although the regiment, because there were some thirty men needed to fill up the ranks, was not fully organized until the latter part of September, 1864. The regiment was on duty, and this chaplain was appointed and discharged the duties of this position all the while from 1863, although technically the regiment was not up to the standard and mustered in.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was mustered in, then, when it was organized.

Mr. THORNBURGH. The regiment was on duty all the time. It was reduced by casualties, and in order to get a complete regiment it became necessary to consolidate it with another regiment.

Mr. HOLMAN. When was the organization finally completed and the regiment mustered in?

Mr. THORNBURGH. It was finally organized in September, 1864, and this man was mustered in as chaplain.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is proposed to go back and to pay him as chaplain during the whole time the regiment was in process of formation from 1863 down to 1864.

Mr. THORNBURGH. The gentleman does not seem to understand the facts in the case. As I have already stated, when he was appointed chaplain, in 1863, this Ninth Tennessee Cavalry Regiment only lacked some thirty-two or thirty-four men of being fully up to the required standard. It was on duty all the time, and this chaplain was on duty with it. When it became afterward reduced by casualties to some four or five hundred men it was consolidated with some other regiment. The bill merely provides that he shall receive pay for the time which he actually did this duty.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why was the regiment not mustered in when it was rendering the service of which the gentleman has spoken?

Mr. MAYNARD. I will explain that to the gentleman. These Tennessee regiments were put on duty the very moment they had soldiers to enter the service. They did not keep back till they were fully organized, but went at once right into the field and were constantly liable to be reduced by the casualties of battle, by death, wounding, capture, &c.; so that the regiments frequently did not for a whole year after they had gone into the service get the number of men that would technically, under the rule, entitle them to their muster, differing in this way from regiments that were organized and fully filled before they took the field. This explains why it is that these men were in the service, in the face of the enemy, performing the most difficult and arduous service of the war, before the regiments were filled up, so that they could be technically mustered under the rules. The men themselves were in service, but the machine we call a regiment, the artificial body which they made up, was, so to speak, not perfected.

Mr. HOLMAN. This was a citizen who was there voluntarily.

Mr. MAYNARD. They were all there voluntarily.

Mr. HOLMAN. It could not be said of the soldiers that they were there serving voluntarily. But this man was there before the law authorized him to be mustered in, rendering certain service, and the question is, whether the Government is to pay for this service or not.

It has been suggested to me, and I think with great propriety, that there is no end to that class of claims. Such claims have generally gone to the Committee on Claims, and if this particular claim has not been before that committee, I know that claims of this class have been before it frequently.

The time fixed by law when an officer might be mustered in is certainly the date from which he should receive compensation. We have passed bills to-day and on every private-bill day, very properly as it seems to me, to reckon officers as mustered in from the day when they were authorized by law to be mustered in, but who, on account of circumstances they could not control, were not actually mustered in. But in this case the law did not authorize the appointment of this gentleman, and he was not entitled to be mustered in until he got his commission. I think there is no good reason why he should receive compensation during the time that the regiment was being formed.

Mr. MAYNARD. We have had that argument before. Men entered into the service, and performed the service that was required of them, went into the presence of the enemy, fought and laid down their lives, and their widows come here for a pension. Their claim has been objected to on the ground that these men were not mustered in, that they were merely serving voluntarily, and that there was no law or principle entitling their widows to any consideration at the hands of the Government. It is precisely the same argument as we have met again and again, and we have had this case brought up here to have the matter tested. And if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will only get through the technical dry bark of the law so as to reach the inside of it, I think his reason will respond at once to the justice of this claim.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman misapprehends me. I have been one of the foremost in insisting on this floor that the officers who served without being mustered in should receive their pay from the date of their commission. I have been very familiar with this class of claims, and have reported more of them perhaps to the House than any other member has done; I mean the claims of officers who actually served as such, but from various causes, after their commissions were issued, were not mustered in. I have always held that when from any sufficient cause, absence on duty, or being in prison, or sickness, the officer could not be mustered in, he ought to be mustered back to the date of his commission and receive his pay from that time. And I have always been gratified by the prompt action of the House in allowing that class of claims on the justice of the Government.

But this is not a case of that kind at all, as the gentleman from Tennessee well knows. We all know how regiments were formed, not only in Tennessee but all over the country. Here was a gentleman not entitled to be appointed at all, whose commission was not issued, and we are asked to say that not only his mustering in but that his actual appointment to office shall be dated back nearly twelve months.

Mr. THORNBURGH. The gentleman is mistaken. This person was actually appointed, and the records in the Adjutant-General's office show that for all the time for which he asks pay he was present on duty, but not mustered in. The records show that he was a chaplain, appointed by the officers of the regiment, and the only reason why he was not mustered in was because one company was not quite full.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me put to the gentleman a case which we find has frequently occurred. A man is actually commissioned by the government of his State to a lieutenancy in his regiment, and cannot be mustered in because the company is reduced below its proper number. The House has said that in that class of cases it cannot afford relief, because of the simple fact that the regiment was not entitled to this officer, and the commission was improperly issued. We have furnished relief wherever, from causes which were not under the control of the officers receiving commissions, they could not be mustered in.

But here, when this commission was issued, it was issued without authority, before the time when the claimant could be mustered in at all. It was issued before the regiment was in a condition to be entitled to this particular officer. While I hold that Congress, in adjusting the claims of all who served the country in the late war, should not only be just, but generous, still I insist that we should not open up a field of such latitude as will be opened up in mustering a man in to date back to the time of the beginning of his regiment, when under the law his regiment was not in a condition to be entitled to such an officer.

The question was on the motion to lay the bill aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass; and being taken, it was agreed to.

RICE M. BROWN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1771) for the relief of Rice M. Brown.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue a bounty-land warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land to Rice M. Brown, for services rendered during the war with Mexico, as a private in Company F, Second Regiment Indiana Volunteers; and also to pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated three months' extra pay to him, for services in the Second Regiment Indiana Volunteers during the war with Mexico.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Rice M. Brown, praying for a bounty-land warrant and three months' extra pay for services rendered during the war with Mexico as a private of Company F, Second Regiment Indiana Volunteers, report:

That they have had the same under consideration, and find the facts in this case fully set forth in a report made by the Military Committee of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-fifth Congress. Your committee adopt that report, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill:

Thirty-fifth Congress, second session. House of Representatives, Report No. 147. January 28, 1859.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made the following report, to accompany bill H. R. No. 845:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Rice M. Brown, praying for a bounty-land warrant and three months' extra pay for services rendered during the war with Mexico as a private in Company F of the Second Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, report:

That in the year 1846 he joined Company F of the Second Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, commanded by Captain Henry Davis, with a view of serving in the war with Mexico. That when said company came to be mustered into the service he was not received, by reason of a defect occasioned by prior illness which caused lameness, one of his legs being shortened. Being anxious to go with said company, he went nominally as servant to Captain Davis, but really as a soldier. He served in said company five or six months, when he was honorably discharged in consequence of sickness. It appears that he performed the services of a soldier until his discharge, and therefore is entitled to the bounty land and extra pay voted by Congress.

Your committee herewith report a bill for his relief.

PETITION.

To the Congress of the United States:

Your petitioner, Rice M. Brown, of the State of Indiana, respectfully showeth: That in the year 1846 he joined Company F, commanded by Captain Henry Davis, in the Second Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, commanded by Colonel William A. Bowles, with a view of serving in the war with Mexico. That when said company came to be mustered into the service he was not mustered in by reason and in consequence of a defect occasioned by prior illness which caused lameness, one of his legs being shortened; but, anxious to go with said company, he went nominally as a servant to said Captain Henry Davis, but really as a soldier. That he served in said company for some five or six months, and was honorably discharged in consequence of sickness at Camp Belknap, Texas, and came home. That for his service he received the wages of a servant—eight dollars per month, and no other pay or allowance from the Government. Those who rendered similar service in all but the name received their pay, extra pay, and a land warrant.

Your petitioner humbly prays your honorable body to grant him extra pay and a land warrant, as would have been allowed him if he had been mustered in as a soldier.

RICE M. BROWN.

STATE OF INDIANA, County of Lawrence, ss:

Before me, the undersigned, a justice of the peace within and for the county aforesaid, personally came Rice M. Brown, who is personally known to me, and who is a person of credit and veracity, and made oath that the foregoing petition is true

Witness my hand this 12th day of March, 1858.

E. D. PEARSON, J. P. [SEAL.]

STATE OF INDIANA, County of Lawrence, ss:

I, Henry Davis, being duly sworn, state that I have read the foregoing petition of Rice M. Brown, and know from my personal knowledge that the same is true in substance and fact.

HENRY DAVIS.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 12th day of March, 1858. And I certify that Henry Davis, who signed the foregoing affidavit, is the identical Henry Davis who was commandar of Company F in Second Regiment of Indiana Volunteers in war with Mexico.

Witness my hand this date above written.

E. D. PEARSON, J. P. [SEAL.]

THE STATE OF INDIANA, Lawrence County, ss:

I, George A. Thornton, clerk of the Lawrence circuit court, certify that Eliphalet D. Pearson, esq., before whom the foregoing instruments were executed, was, at the time of the execution, an acting justice of the peace in and for said county and State, duly commissioned and qualified, and that all his official acts as such are entitled to full faith and credit; and further, that his signatures above are genuine.

Witness my hand and the seal of said court, at Bedford, this 12th day of March, 1858.

[SEAL.] GEORGE THORNTON, Clerk.

Mr. HUNTER. I presented this claim, and I desire to state to the committee the facts in the case. They are simply these: At the breaking out of the Mexican war Mr. Brown, being quite a young man and anxious to enter the Army, joined Captain Davis's company. When the surgeon came to examine the soldiers proposing enlistment, this Brown was not received on account of physical disability; I believe one of his limbs was a little shorter than the other. Still, being anxious to go into the service, he requested Captain Davis to muster him in as a cook, which he did. After the company had gone to the field young Brown, with the consent of his captain, took his musket and served as a soldier in the company. He served in that capacity for about six months, when he was taken sick and discharged. All the soldiers of the Mexican war upon their discharge received three months' extra pay and a bounty-land warrant. But Mr. Brown, notwithstanding he had served as a soldier for some six months, being on the muster-roll only as cook, was not entitled to receive the three months' pay or the bounty warrant.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. He was not mustered in.

Mr. HUNTER. He was mustered in as cook, and then he served as a soldier with his musket about six months. That is the statement of Captain Davis, whom I know to be as good a man as there is in my State, and I would believe any statement that he would make, whether under oath or not. The point I make is this: If this young man really carried his musket and served as a soldier for more than six months, and could not receive his bounty warrant and extra pay because he was mustered in merely as a cook and not as a soldier, he is entitled to this relief, and I hope the House will grant it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. My purpose in rising was to call attention to the fact that this claim is nearly thirty years old. It simply appears by the report presented here that this Brown went as a servant; that he could not be mustered into the service as a soldier because he did not physically answer the requirements, but he went voluntarily as a servant.

Mr. HUNTER. He was mustered in as a cook; the statement of facts will show that.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I was merely following the report. If there is any report to be submitted in this case, which will bring him within the law, of course I will not object to that. But in the report which the committee present here, they say they take the report of a committee of a former Congress, which says that this Brown went as a servant; that he was mustered into the service on account of physical disability, and that he left it at the end of six months on account of illness. I make no particular objection to the bill, except to call the attention of the committee to the question whether it is wise to give bounty and back pay after this lapse of time.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that the same do pass.

WILLIAM N. WILLIAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1772) for the relief of William N. Williams, late second lieutenant of volunteers.

The bill provides that William N. Williams, late a second lieutenant of the Sixth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry, be mustered as such second lieutenant, to date from the 30th day of March, 1862; and that the Paymaster-General of the Army pay him, out of any money in the Treasury appropriated for the pay of the Army, the sum of $138.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William N. Williams, late a second lieutenant of Company G, Sixth Indiana Volunteers, praying relief, have had the same under consideration, and report as follows:

On the 30th day of March, 1862, a vacancy of second lieutenant of Company G, in the Sixth Regiment Indiana Infantry Volunteers, on application of the captain of said company, was filled by the commanding officer of said regiment, by a regimental order, assigning Sergeant-major W. N. Williams to said position of second lieutenant of said company. He served in said position until the 30th of May, 1862, when he was promoted to be first lieutenant of said company. During the time petitioner was serving in said regiment Governor O. P. Morton, then governor of Indiana, visited the front, and, exhausting his supply of blank commissions, gave this petitioner, with others, certificates in lieu thereof; and did afterward forward his commission as such second lieutenant, dated March 30, 1862; but before said commission was received, and while acting under the "certificate" of Governor Morton, petitioner was captured; and when mustered as a commissioned officer, after his release from prison, the mustering officers refused to muster him on his commission as second lieutenant of said company, but mustered him on his commission as first lieutenant, which was dated from May 30, 1862. William N. Williams having received only the pay of sergeant-major for the time commencing March 30, 1862, and ending May 30, 1862, a period of two months, during which time he was acting as a second lieutenant, as hereinbefore stated, is entitled to receive the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of infantry for the two months specified, less the amount he has already received.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that the same do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

SAMUEL E. RANKIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1773) for the relief of Samuel E. Rankin.

The bill directs the Paymaster-General to pay to Samuel E. Rankin, late a first lieutenant of the Ninth Tennessee Cavalry Regiment, the full pay and allowances of a first lieutenant of cavalry, from the 5th day of October, 1865, to February 13, 1866.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel E. Rankin, late a first lieutenant of the Ninth Tennessee Cavalry, asking pay and allowance from October 5, 1865, to February 13, 1866, beg leave to report as follows:

First Lieutenant Rankin was mustered into the United States service for the term of three years, or during the war, on the 2d day of February, 1864. On the 19th of September, 1865, he was put on trial before a general court-martial, at Chattanooga, Tennessee, for the murder of John A. Thornhill, on the 24th of June, 1865. Of this charge he was honorably acquitted; the decision of the court-martial was approved, and Lieutenant Rankin was relieved from arrest, and restored to duty on the 5th of October, 1865. He was paid to the said 5th day of October, but was not relieved from duty, or finally mustered out, until February 13, 1866. It seems, therefore, to the committee, that Lieutenant Samuel E. Rankin should be paid as first lieutenant from October 5, 1865, to February 13, 1866, and they report the accompanying bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that this measure requires some explanation. This soldier claims to have been mustered out on the 5th of October, 1865. Why was he not paid for his services?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Because he had not been relieved from arrest, and the balance of the regiment was mustered out, while he was retained on duty until the 13th of February following.

Mr. HOLMAN. When was the regiment mustered out of service?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. On the 5th of October, 1865.

Mr. HOLMAN. And it is proposed to pay this man after his regiment was mustered out?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Because he was not relieved from duty.

Mr. HOLMAN. His regiment was mustered out of service?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. There was a special order for that; but this officer was retained on duty because of charges against him, and he was not discharged until February following.

Mr. HOLMAN. Have these papers ever been before the Adjutant-General?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it his recommendation that this bill should pass?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I do not know that he recommends that the bill should pass. It would seem to be manifest injustice to deprive a man of his pay when he was not relieved from duty, and not mustered out of service.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was he mustered in after the termination of the war?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. He was restored to duty October 5, 1865, but not mustered out until February 13, 1866.

Mr. HOLMAN. As I understand, when he was restored to duty October 5, 1865, he had been serving three years previously.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Certainly; and it is now proposed to pay him from that date until February 13, 1866, for the reason that the latter is the date when he was mustered out. He served until that time. It required a special order for his mustering out, which order was issued and is now on file with the papers.

Mr. HOLMAN. What duty was he performing after his regiment had been disbanded?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I suppose he was performing duty in one of the cities of Tennessee. I do not know that he was performing any special duty; but he was not relieved from duty until the date I have named.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, sir, there are cases where soldiers enlisting during the late war have not even up to this time been mustered out; and claims founded upon such cases are now before the Committee on War Claims. If we authorize the payment of any such claim against the Government, innumerable others will be presented. The presumption is that when a regiment is mustered out any officer of that regiment ceases to receive compensation. I insist that if this officer remained in service after the close of the war and after his regiment was mustered out, the fact should appear that he was on actual duty.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. It does appear in the report.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Suppose he did nothing; but that there was an order of the War Department that he should not be mustered out, but should remain subject to orders, and that he did, in fact, so remain. That is the exact condition of this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. No proof of that fact has been read.

Mr. THORNBURGH. That is the proof on file with the papers—that there was an order of the War Department preventing the mustering out of this officer and holding him in the service.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand that this officer was by such an order kept in the service after the expiration of his term and after the mustering out of his regiment?

Mr. THORNBURGH. Yes, sir; and he asks now to be paid up to the time when he was actually mustered out by order of the War Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call attention to the fact (and I am very glad the gentleman from Tennessee is in his seat) that there have been more mortifying claims before this House in connection with these Tennessee regiments than have arisen in connection with any other branch of the service; and in a case so extraordinary as this, it does seem to me we should be furnished with some explanation from the War Department itself as to why this man should have remained in service after his regiment was mustered out and after the expiration of his term, and why he should seek to be paid for remaining in service under those circumstances. He may have remained in the service without being mustered out in consequence simply of his own act.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I presume the remark of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is true, that since the war there have been, perhaps, more mortifying claims presented from my State than from any State in the Union. But, sir, it is the claimants who have been mortified. They went into the service of the Government without waiting for legal authority that might guarantee to them their pay. Escaping from their homes and going upon the soil of another State, they asked only for guns; and when these were given to them they marched back under the flag of their country to the defense of their State, without waiting for any commissions from the governor of the State or from the President of the United States. Thousands of men went into the service of the Government in that way from Tennessee. A great many of them had no commissions. Two regiments that served for three years had no commission and no muster at all. They were paid as though they had been mustered, because there was an order to that effect from the Secretary of War or the President. There are to-day within my knowledge cases of officers and soldiers who served for months and years, and who have never asked for pay, because they are mortified that such claims, when presented, are frequently disallowed and have very little attention paid to them.

This man was retained in service as an officer of the Army by order of the Secretary of War; and I say that, being thus held subject to duty, he is entitled to pay up to the time when he was mustered out.

Mr. HOLMAN. All I ask is that that order of the Secretary of War may be read; for it is certainly without precedent, so far as the experience of this House goes, that after the termination of the war, after the expiration of his term of service, and after the date when he should have been mustered out, a soldier should be retained in service by an order of the War Department. I think it may, perhaps, be found that he was ordered into some other service, and in that other capacity received some other form of compensation. Certainly this soldier was not bound to serve after the expiration of his term.

Mr. THORNBURGH. He was held for trial by court-martial on the charge of murder, as the report shows.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was he held on a charge of murder before a court-martial between October 5, 1865, and February 13, 1866?

Mr. THORNBURGH. He was tried by court-martial after his regiment was mustered out.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was it during the period for which compensation is claimed—from October 5, 1865, to February 13, 1866? Was it during that time that he was held on this charge of murder?

Mr. THORNBURGH. I do not remember whether he was under the charge of murder all the time; but I know he was for a considerable portion of it.

Mr. HOLMAN. He could not have been held in service under an order of the Secretary of War if he was held for the purpose of being tried by court-martial.

Mr. THORNBURGH. The order of the Secretary of War prevented him from being mustered out.

Mr. HOLMAN. Did he perform military duty during the war?

Mr. THORNBURGH. I only know that he could not have been mustered out because of the orders of the Secretary of War, and that he was engaged in connection with the summoning of witnesses preparing for this trial by court-martial. There is no question he did receive orders and performed the duty assigned to him under those orders.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there is an order from the Secretary of War it must be among the papers.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I do not know, but the proof is ample to show that he was acting under special orders, and could not be mustered out even if he wanted to be.

Mr. HOLMAN. The only reason why this man was not mustered out was because he was guilty of a high crime, the crime of murder; that is the only thing which prevented him being mustered out, and I do not see any justice in it at all.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 7.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. THORNBURGH were appointed.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 108, noes 19; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled under the rule to have the roll called and the names of the absentees reported to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of saving the time of the House, and with a view to having a vote on this bill in the House, I will not insist on further count, but will let the bill be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MATTHIAS WHITEHEAD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1774) for the relief of Matthias Whitehead.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Adjutant-General of the Army be, and he is thereby, directed to remove the charge of desertion from the name of Matthias Whitehead, late a private of Company G, Eighth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry; and that the said Matthias Whitehead shall be allowed and paid the back pay and bounty due him in the same manner and to the same extent as if the said charge of desertion had never been made.

It appears from the report, which was read, that Mr. Whitehead enlisted December 17, 1862, and was wounded in the foot about August 15, 1864, after having been in the service twenty months. He was admitted to the hospital soon after the time of receiving his wound. He swears that, being near home, the surgeon gave him sick-leave for twenty days, September 5, 1864; and that he was too sick to return afterward, until his regiment had been mustered out.

It appears that Mr. Whitehead was not mustered as a deserter, but was, on the 30th day of June, 1865, regularly mustered out and received an honorable discharge.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FOSTER A. HIXSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 1775) for the relief of Foster A. Hixson, late paymaster in the United States Army.

The bill, which was read, provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and are thereby, required and directed to allow to Major Foster A. Hixson, late a paymaster in the United States Army, in the settlement of his accounts, a credit of $10,000, being the amount which was stolen from him at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 1st of March, 1867; provided that no part of this allowance shall be used to settle any other accounts of said paymaster; and provided further, that it shall be in lieu of all existing allowances to him under existing laws.

It appears from the report that Major Foster A. Hixson, of Yates County, New York, was a paymaster in the United States Army in the year 1864, and acted as such until August, 1867.

On the 1st day of March, 1867, he obtained from the assistant treasurer of the United States, at Charleston, South Carolina, on a check of Major C. W. Wingard, chief paymaster, $50,000 to take to Savannah to pay troops. It was in five separate packages, one of $10,000 in national-bank bills.

He placed the money in a stout leather bag, carefully locked in his room at his boarding-house, and remained with it until a short time before the steamer started for Savannah, Georgia. He left his room (locked) for the purpose of procuring assistance to take his baggage to the steamer. The name of the steamer upon which he took passage for Savannah was the Dictator. He occupied a state-room and only left it for breakfast. At Savannah, on reaching his office on March 2, nine a. m., he discovered, on examination, that the package of $10,000 in national-bank bills was gone. He reported the fact immediately to Major C. W. Wingard, chief paymaster at Charleston, who procured the services of a detective, M. L. Burnell, with what result we will let the Paymaster-General, Benjamin Alvord, say:

Mr. Burnell, from his investigation, (which appears to have been thorough,) became satisfied that said theft was not committed on the steamer, but at the boarding-house in Charleston, at the time that Major Hixson left his room to get assistance to take his baggage to the steamer, or to go to supper, for Major Wingard states that such was the object of his absence.

His room was in a boarding-house (occupied by Major Wingard and family) next to the Planters' House. He came to that hotel office, and one Charles E. Hooks, hotel watchman, was present when the baggage arrived, and, as Major Hixson was about to take his baggage to his room, asked the colonel if he had made a raise of greenbacks. Hooks had access to pass-keys to enter Major Hixson's room, and he left that night for the North. Burnell, the detective, visited Savannah, traveled on the same steamer, (the Dictator,) went to Fernandina, Florida, to follow up investigations concerning various parties on the steamer, but found no grounds of suspicion worthy of being pushed.

As shown by General Brice's indorsement, of 2d April, 1867, the continued employment of a detective was authorized after that date. And Major Hixson, in his letter of 13th January last, states that Hooks was arrested in Connecticut and taken to Charleston, South Carolina, and kept in confinement until January, 1868, when he was released for the reason that the public prosecutor th ought the evidence furnished by Mr. Burnell was not sufficient to secure conviction.

The unfortunate death of Mr. Burnell, in 1869, removes important testimony which might have assisted in forming a judgment in this case.

It was unfortunate that his (Hixson's) clerk did not accompany him to Charleston, on this journey for funds; but it appears from Major Hixson's report that the public service required that he should be left in charge of the paymaster's office at Savannah.

But Lieutenant-Colonel Wingard, in his first indorsement of 5th March, 1867, speaks of Major F. A. Hixson as a valuable and faithful officer. In his affidavit of January 8th last, he says: "I had known Colonel Hixson as a paymaster about two years at the time he was robbed. His character for integrity and honesty was above reproach or suspicion. While subject to my orders as chief paymaster he discharged most efficiently and satisfactorily all his duties as paymaster, and from all the circumstances surrounding his loss of Government funds, I am entirely satisfied he was robbed, and should be relieved by Congress of all censure or pecuniary responsibility in the premises."

The Paymaster-General concludes his report as follows:

All the testimony at my command shows the high character and unquestioned integrity and fidelity of Major Hixson, and I am, upon careful study of the case from all the lights furnished by the records, forced to the conviction that he was robbed of the sum of $10,000, and has a just and equitable claim for relief from Congress for the same.

The evidence before the committee is conclusive that Major Hixson was robbed of $10,000 on the 1st of March, 1867, at Charleston, South Carolina; that he used all ordinary care to protect himself against such robbery. The evidence is also conclusive that Major Hixson is a man of great probity of character, and therefore recommend that the relief he prays for be granted, and report the accompanying bill for his relief.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to call the attention of the committee to one characteristic of this report. It does not anywhere tell there was evidence before the committee that this paymaster used due diligence and care with regard to the safety of this money. It appears strange that a man with $50,000 in his care should leave it in his room unguarded and unprotected, and go out upon the street in search of aid. It appears that the paymaster went to his meals and left $50,000 in his room, where it was not put in any safe place. That report does not satisfy me this man used such diligence and such care as to be entitled to relief from this House. That he was robbed of the money I do not doubt; that he lost the money I do not doubt; but I do not think Congress should be compelled to pay back what he lost by his carelessness.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I should like to say to the gentleman from Minnesota the committee, in the concluding paragraph of the report, did say this paymaster "used all ordinary care to protect himself against robbery." Major Hixson himself was summoned to appear before the Committee on Military Affairs. He came here from his residence in New York and testified under oath to all the facts. His testimony is on the files of the House.

It seems that Major Hixson had rented rooms in a house rented by several paymasters, in which he lodged. Charleston was the headquarters of the Army at that time, and the chief paymaster of the district was there. Nobody knew that Major Hixson had any money. He went to his room with the money locked up in this leather bag, and was only absent for the space of a minute or two. He locked the door, and nobody had access to the room so far as he knew. He thought it was not advisable for him to publish the fact that he was a paymaster and had $50,000 in a room in that house. For it must be borne in mind that the Planters' Hotel was not kept as a hotel at that time. Its use as a hotel had been abandoned. And if he had published the fact that he was a paymaster of the United States Army, and had conveyed to his room $50,000, the danger of his being robbed would have been much greater.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would ask the gentleman whether it is not a singular fact, this money being in five separate packages, that the person who opened this satchel should have taken only one package.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I will explain to the gentleman how that was. It was a double carpet-bag. One package was in the one side or pocket of the bag, and the others were in the other side; and this package which was taken contained the notes of the national banks. The time that intervened between the departure of Major Hixson from his room and his return to it was but a few moments, and the person who committed the theft must have been in a great hurry, because when Major Hixson returned there was nobody there. If the whole amount had been taken out of the satchel he would have discovered the theft at once, because the burden would have been lighter. But the fact that the satchel did not seem to be any lighter prevented Major Hixson from discovering his loss until he got to Savannah.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to repeat the point I was endeavoring to make. It is this: It seems to me that beyond all question it was an act of gross carelessness for a man to leave $50,000 in a carpet-sack in a room in his hotel. And I will say that no such claim has been allowed to pass through the Committee on Claims. We have voted down cases which, so far as I can judge from the record, were much more meritorious than this. We have demanded not the ordinary care which gentlemen speak of in this report, but extraordinary care. A Federal officer with $50,000 in his possession is bound to exercise extraordinary care. He could have had it about his person, or have put it into a safe, or put it into a bank while he was remaining there. He had no right to leave $50,000 of the public moneys in his room and go his ways.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he is familiar with the manner in which paymasters carried their money around during the war?

Mr. DUNNELL. I am not. But I do not think that paymasters leave their money in their rooms in this way.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I would also ask the gentleman if he knows how large a package $50,000 in fives and twenties, to pay the troops, would make, and if he supposes that a man could carry that amount so made up about his person; or when at that time in the city of Charleston, when houses were abandoned and hotels closed, he could have got a safe in a private boarding-house in which to put the money. I have myself seen during the war, paymasters traveling with $50,000, $100,000, or $300,000, without any safe in which to put the money, and the Quartermaster's Department furnished no transportation at that time, so that they had to carry the money among the baggage.

Mr. McKEE. Did they not have a guard?

Mr. DUNNELL. Was not every paymaster entitled to a safe?

Mr. MYERS. Some of the safes were small and could be carried away. I have seen it done.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to say a few words on this matter. It is, of course, well known to the members of this committee that I am chairman of the Committee on Claims, and it is the fact, as has been stated by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] that no such claim as this has ever passed that committee while I have been on it. Now it is of course the duty of the Committee on Claims to familiarize itself with the legislation on subjects of this character, and with the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims was given jurisdiction of such cases as might arise where persons claimed that they might have been wronged by the failure of the Government to perform its contract with them as private individuals. Jurisdiction was also given to the Court of Claims so that all persons who were disbursing officers might apply to that court for the purpose of being relieved from losses sustained while they were acting in that capacity.

It is to this point I desire to draw the attention of the committee. Here is a paymaster. He claims that he has lost $10,000. He says it was stolen from him. The Court of Claims is the very place established by law for him to go for the purpose of having that question tried. He could not there give his testimony; but before the Committee on Military Affairs, or before any other committee of the House, if they see fit to hear the party himself, he might become a witness; whereas in the Court of Claims the party himself cannot be a witness—and that makes a great difference. But it is not specially to that I desire to direct the remarks I am now making. It is more especially to this point: I do not think that this paymaster exercised that care and diligence which it was his duty to exercise as an officer of the Government. He had in his possession, as paymaster, $50,000 of money. He left that money in his room, left it there in charge of no one, and went to dinner. Now it does not seem to me that it was prudent, that it was exercising ordinary care, that it was exercising such care as a man would exercise over his own money. It seems to me that no prudent man having in his possession $50,000 in money would have it in his stateroom unguarded while he went off.

I call the attention of this committee to a further fact in reference to this matter, that he was a paymaster, and known to be such; and therefore when any person saw him upon the boat or about it, with this paymaster's bag, which could not have been a small one, to contain packages of notes to the amount of $50,000—any person would know what he was. Therefore greater prudence would be required on his part. I do not like to antagonize a bill from a committee of which I am a member, but I do not think this is one which should be passed by Congress.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT,] who reported this bill.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Very well.

Mr. DUNNELL. I find the following in the report of the committee on this case:

His room was in a boarding-house (occupied by Major Wingard and family) next to the Planters' House. He came to that hotel office, and one Charles E. Hooks, hotel watchman, was present when the baggage arrived, and, as Major Hixson was about to take his baggage to his room, asked the colonel if he had made a raise of greenbacks.

This Hooks asked Major Hixson whether he had made a raise of greenbacks. Now, was there any evidence before the committee as to what reply Major Hixson made?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Yes, sir. Major Hixon says he did not hear the remark, that he did not know Mr. Hooks, and that this fact was brought to his knowledge afterward by the detective. Major Hixson left that night. After he returned he placed the matter in the hands of a detective. Then the absence of Hooks was discovered, and the remark he had made was made known to Major Hixson.

I was going to say, if I was not clear before, that the Planters' Hotel was not then occupied as a hotel. This man Hooks and one other person probably had charge of the hotel, but Major Hixson did not know that fact. The house in which Major Hixson had a room was occupied partly by Colonel Wingate, chief paymaster of that department, and by other paymasters. For the time being the room belonged to Major Hixson. He came there, took charge of the room, deposited his parcel in it, locked the door, and went out, not to get his dinner as has been said here, but to make arrangements for his passage on the steamer. He was absent not more than two or three minutes, and during that time the man Hooks, who knew his business, took advantage of his absence, went into his room, and stole one package of notes and left. Major Hixson returned, took his carpet-bag and went to the boat, without discovering the theft.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Why could not this paymaster go to the Court of Claims, as every other claimant does?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. According to the rules of the Court of Claims, a person interested in a matter before the court cannot himself become a witness in the case. A person interested can be a witness, I believe, in all the other courts of the United States, but not in the Court of Claims. That is the reason why Major Hixson appears before Congress instead of going to the Court of Claims.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That same objection would apply to every claimant in that court.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Yes; and I have heard distinguished lawyers upon this floor say that they thought that objection should be removed; that it was an invidious distinction to prevent persons from being witnesses in the Court of Claims and nowhere else. That is the fact. This is a case which must depend upon the statement of Major Hixson, because the detective is dead.

The Committee on Military Affairs were very largely influenced in this matter by the report of the Paymaster-General of the Army. Immediately after the larceny of this money was discovered, complaint was made to Major Wingard, who employed a detective at that place by the name of Burnell. That detective is now dead, but this matter was very fully investigated by him, and there is a very full, elaborate, and exhaustive report upon this very subject, which is among the papers submitted in this case. The detective followed up the case, and finally discovered that the money was stolen by this man Hooks. He reported all the facts to the Paymaster-General, who I think is a fair watch-dog of the Treasury; and he, after a careful examination of all the facts, says that this is a case that would justify Congress in granting the relief asked.

The reason why the committee report that Major Hixson should not be allowed anything more than to cover this deficit, is that under existing laws paymasters are allowed a credit of $5,000 in the settlement of their accounts, so that Major Hixson, will in fact and reality be entitled to a credit of but $5,000 in the settlement of his accounts.

Allow me to request the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] to go back in memory to the year 1867 in Charleston, when that city was partially uninhabited, when a great many houses were unoccupied, when there were no safes there, and when Major Hixson could not leave his money in bank because he had just drawn it out of the treasury. He had just taken the money out of the treasury for the purpose of carrying it to Savannah where he was to pay troops.

Now, does it not appear, Mr. Chairman, that ordinary care was exercised by this officer in regard to this money? He did not leave it probably for more than five minutes; and he had his door locked. Where could he have taken it? The hotel was abandoned; and there was no safe there in which he could have deposited it. There was no safe in his room; and there was nobody at the time in whose charge he could leave it. If he had undertaken to carry the money with him all the time, the danger of robbery or loss might have been still greater.

Now it is possible that with the experience that Major Hixson has had upon this subject, or with the experience which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] may have had, he would not do now as he did then. I do not believe I would do so now, though perhaps at that time I would have done precisely the same thing; because the question for Major Hixson to consider was whether under all the circumstances he was exercising ordinary care and diligence in the custody of this money. It seemed to the committee that under all the circumstances, supported, as the claim is, by the report of the Paymaster-General of the Army, the case is one in which relief should be granted.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Was this room in the boarding-house occupied by Major Hixson under assignment from the quartermaster, or did Major Hixson rent it from the person keeping the boarding-house?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. It was a room which he rented and occupied himself when he came to Charleston.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Does it appear who was the person who asked Major Hixson "whether he had made a raise of greenbacks?"

Mr. ALBRIGHT. It was some person that was in the house.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Was it Major Wingard?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. No, sir; it was some person who was in the hall of the house, as he passed through.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. If other parts of the same building were occupied by other paymasters, why could not Major Hixson have left the money in their charge? Why could he not have taken it to some other room, or carried it with him? When there were other paymasters, occupying adjoining rooms in the same building, why should this man have left this money in his room with no one in charge of it?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. The gentleman supposes that paymasters in the Army are always in their rooms. That is a mistake. They are generally with troops, or making arrangements to pay them. These other paymasters were not in their rooms; and there was nobody to whom Major Hixson could intrust this money. It was in his own room, which he paid rent for; and he had it under lock and key. He placed this baggage in his room until he could procure assistance for going to the boat.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. LAMPORT. I would like to say a few words on this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw my motion temporarily to allow the gentleman to proceed.

Mr. LAMPORT. Major Hixson, a gentleman with whom I am well acquainted, comes to Congress in the first place sustained in reputation by certificates of the best men in the portion of the State in which he resides. This was very proper, because the facts upon which the claim is based depend in a great measure upon his own testimony. Major Hixson proposed first to go to the Court of Claims; but he found he was excluded from that tribunal by the statute. Therefore he comes to this House sustained, as I have already said, by certificates of character from the best men of Western New York. I myself, in my humble way, can indorse him, because he lives within a few miles of my residence. He presents his case upon the simple statement of facts, as related by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT.]

Now, I submit that no faithful public officer ought to be presumed, in this House or anywhere else, to be a dishonest man. I submit that under the circumstances which surrounded paymasters in the Army during the war, we cannot expect that they should have exercised the same measure of discretion and prudence that might have been exercised at other times and under other circumstances. Major Hixson, in his statement before the committee, explained very clearly, to my mind, why he did not make more ado about his having money in his custody. It was understood by the paymasters that the less they said about having money with them the safer they were. This bundle of money which, was perhaps the size of half a bushel, was put by this officer in his carpet-bag. He put four packages on one side and buttoned it up; he then put one package in the other side, being $10,000; and this side of the bag not being buttoned, and therefore more accessible, is probably the reason why no more than this one package was stolen. The thief evidently watched for his opportunity, and when Major Hixson had stepped out for a moment or two, turned the key, took this package, and left. Undoubtedly the thief was a man who was followed by the detective up into the State of Connecticut, where he opened an establishment of ill reputation, having apparently plenty of money. He was arrested and brought down by the detective, and was kept in prison for months, when, upon a hearing on habeas corpus, it was determined that there was not sufficient proof to convict him.

In considering this case, we must take into view the peculiar circumstances; that there was a condition of war, and that these paymasters were obliged to carry large amounts of money from place to place, avoiding notoriety as much as possible. Some gentlemen ask, why did not this man put the money in a safe? Where could he have found a safe? It has also been asked why he did not call in a guard. He might have done that; but was that ordinarily done by such officers? By no means. He occupied a room in a building in which Colonel Wingard, another paymaster, had a room. Major Hixson left his room for a few minutes to make preparations for going to Savannah; and leaving the room for so short a time, no man could expect him to go about the city to find a safe in which to put this money. It may not have been the most prudent thing for him to have done; he may not have exercised all the prudence which could have been suggested; but I submit to this House whether it would be right to impose upon this officer, faithful as he has been in the discharge of his duty, indorsed as he has been by every Army officer who has been brought into contact with him, the payment of this $10,000 of which he was robbed while in the performance of his duty, exercising all the due diligence which he could command for the safety and protection of the public funds confided to his care. I regret very much to find gentlemen in this House charging every official who happens to come here for relief, never mind how good a record he may have had, with being a scoundrel. It seems to me the experience of members of Congress ought to have taught them a different lesson. If we were to take the judgment of the newspaper press throughout the country as final, members of Congress were themselves the greatest scoundrels in reference to a certain measure providing for back pay. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. The gentleman refers to the last Congress.

Mr. LAMPORT. Excuse me in that matter, many of the new members, who were not in the last Congress, seem to have been in the same difficulty exactly as the members of the last Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 47; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. ALBRIGHT as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 40; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum voting, the Chair will be compelled, under the rule, to have the roll called and the names of the absentees reported to the House. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or the Committee of the Whole House, finds itself without a quorum, the chairman shall cause the roll of the House to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal, (Rule 126.) And as soon (after rising for such purpose) as a quorum is ascertained to be present, the House must return into committee.

Mr. SENER. Will not a motion that the committee rise obviate that call of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not; the call of the House must proceed under the rule.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. This call will consume a great deal of time, and I hope we will be allowed to go into the House with the bills which have been already acted on, so they may be disposed of this evening.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana to waive his motion to strike out the enacting clause so we may rise and report other bills.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barry, Begole, Bell, Berry, Bland, Bradley, Bright, Buckner, Cain, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Freman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Coburn, Comingo, Cook, Creamer, Crocker, Crutchfield, Curtis, Darrall, Alexander M. Davis, John J. Davis, Dawes, De Witt, Duell, Eden, Eldredge, Elliott, Farwell, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, John T. Harris, Havens, John B. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, Hersey, Hodges, Holman, Hooper, Hubbell, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hynes, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowndes, Luttrell, Magee, Marshall, Alexander S. McDill, Mitchell, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Negley, Nesmith, Nunn, O'Neill, Packard, Packer, Page, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Potter, Pratt, Purnam, Rapier, Rawls, William R. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloss, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Standeford, Stephens, Stone, Strait, Swann, Sypher, Taylor, Thomas, Todd, Tremain, Tyner, Waddell, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Whiteley, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, Wilshire, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, and Woodworth.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ORTH reported the Committee of the Whole House, having the Private Calendar under consideration and finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called and directed him to report the names of the absentees to the House.

The SPEAKER. The call of the roll shows the presence of one hundred and fifty members, more than a quorum, and the committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session, (Mr. ORTH in the chair.)

Mr. RANDALL. I move the committee rise and report the bills which have been already acted on.

Mr. HOLMAN. The committee were dividing on my motion to strike out the enacting clause on the Hixson bill, and I would like to know whether it is in order to move the committee rise while the House is dividing on my motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to rise, like a motion to adjourn, is always in order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it in order for the committee to rise when it is dividing?

Mr. RANDALL. There has been intermediate business.

Mr. HOLMAN. There has not been and could not be any intermediate business.

The CHAIRMAN. In reference to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Indiana, the Chair will observe that while the committee was dividing it found itself without a quorum; but on a call of the roll it was ascertained that a quorum was present; and that fact having been reported to the House, the House again immediately returned into committee as a matter of course. The matter stands precisely as if no division had taken place, and the motion to rise takes precedence.

Mr. RANDALL. That is, the motion to rise and report the bills which the committee has disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. Precisely.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I again raise the point of order that on the call of the roll I did not hear my name called.

The CHAIRMAN. That cannot be taken notice of in the committee.

The motion that the committee rise and report its action to the House was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ORTH reported that, in pursuance of the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report the bill (H. R. No. 141) granting a pension to William Swanzey with the recommendation that it be laid on the table, and sundry other bills with the recommendation that the same be passed, some with and some without amendments.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire, with the leave of the House, to make a personal statement. It will take but a few moments.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. In some remarks which I made in this House on the salary question, I stated that Mr. Chester D. Hubbard, a member of the Thirty-ninth Congress, had stated that he would not take his increased pay, but had subsequently recanted and taken it. I made that statement upon what I deemed to be full and just authority for it, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, CASH DIVISION,
Washington, December 10, 1873.

SIR: In reply to yours of this date, making inquiries in reference to the pay of Hon. C. D. Hubbard, a member of the Thirty-ninth Congress, I beg to say that this office has no record of the payments for this Congress, the vouchers having been forwarded to the accounting officers; and the book referred to by you is probably on file in the office of the Register of the Treasury.

Very respectfully,

L. R. TUTTLE,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

Hon. N. G. ORDWAY,
Sergeant-at-Arms House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. The Clerk will also be kind enough to read the indorsement on the back of the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

REGISTER'S OFFICE, TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
December 10, 1873.

The books on file in this office show that Hon. C. D. Hubbard, of West Virginia, received his pay at the rate of $5,000 per annum for the Thirty-ninth Congress.

N. B. WALKER,
(For Register.)

Mr. RANDALL. Subsequently my attention was called to this question, and I found that I was mistaken. It will be noticed that the Assistant Treasurer of the United States asserts in the letter which has been read that he has no record of the payments for the Thirty-ninth Congress, and refers to the Register's office; and the statement from the Register's office is that the full amount was paid. But I have since made a full examination of the matter, and have been furnished with the receipts, which were signed by F. E. Spinner United States Treasurer. The first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress adjourned July 28, 1866. My object now is to place on file the two receipts given to Mr. Hubbard, so as to counteract any injurious impression my first statement may have made with reference to that gentleman. And I do it with the more pleasure because it never was my intention to misrepresent him or any one upon this floor, and also because I have been approached in this matter with that courtesy which should always prompt any man seeking simple justice at the hands of another desiring, as I desire, to do justice.

I wish to add just one word. Mr. Hubbard by his action covered, on August 9, 1866, and March 6, 1867, that money into the Treasury, and he could not get it out again without an act of Congress.

The receipts to which I have referred are as follows:

No. 793.] TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
August 9, 1866.

I certify that Hon. C. D. Hubbard, M. C., has this day deposited to the credit of the United States $2,691.66, account of appropriation, mileage, and compensation of members of House of Representatives, for which I have signed duplicate receipts.

$2,691.66.

F. E. SPINNER,
Treasurer United States.

No. 548.] TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 6, 1867.

I certify that Hon. C. D. Hubbard has this day deposited to the credit of the United States $931.92, account appropriation, mileage, and compensation House of Representatives, for which I have signed duplicate receipts.

$931.92.

L. R. TUTTLE,
Assistant Treasurer United States.

WILLIAM SWANZEY.

The first business reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 141) granting a pension to William Swanzey. The committee recommended that the same be laid upon the table.

The report of the committee was agreed to, and the bill was laid on the table.

HENRY S. WELLES.

The bill (H. R. No. 1759) was reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar with the following amendment:

Strike out these words: "being the amount found due in the settlement of his accounts, as authorized by the Secretary of War," and insert "which said sum shall be in full satisfaction to said Welles for all claims referred to in the report and recommendation from the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported without amendment from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, were severally ordered to be engrossed; and being engrossed, were read the third time and passed; motions to reconsider the votes by which they were severally passed being also laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. No. 1587) for the relief of William H. Pilkenton, late a second lieutenant in Company G, Fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 1589) for the relief of Henry Savage, acting chargé d'affaires of the United States in Guatemala from May 7, 1856, to November 14, 1858;

A bill (H. R. No. 526) for the relief of James De Long;

A bill (H. R. No. 1271) for the relief of John T. Watson, of Cincinnati, Ohio;

A bill (H. R. No. 1763) to permit Edward Savage, of Minnesota, to enter one quarter-section of the public lands, or any legal subdivision of the same;

A bill (H. R. No. 1768) for the relief of Ephraim P. Showalter;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 53) authorizing the issue of clothing to certain enlisted men of the Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 363) for the relief of Lucius A. Rountree;

A bill (H. R. No. 368) for the relief of James Long;

A bill (H. R. No. 1779) for the relief of William E. Childs;

A bill (H. R. No. 498) to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer;

A bill (H. R. No. 622) for the relief of John N. Newman, late an acting first lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1770) for the relief of Jonathan L. Mann, late a chaplain in the volunteer service of the Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 1771) for the relief of Rice M. Brown, a soldier of the Mexican war; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1772) for the relief of William N. Williams, late a second lieutenant of Indiana Volunteers.

SAMUEL E. RANKIN.

The Committee of the Whole also reported, with a recommendation that the same do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 1773) for the relief of Samuel E. Rankin.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report accompanying this bill be read.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I have sent for and obtained papers which I think will satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let them be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Special Orders, No. 65.—Extract.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 13, 1866.

3. First Lieutenant Samuel E. Rankin, Ninth Tennessee Cavalry, is hereby mustered out and honorably discharged the service of the United States, to date September 11, 1865, his command having been mustered out at that date, by reason of its services being no longer required. He will receive no final payments until he has satisfied the Pay Department that he is not indebted to the Government.

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

[Special Orders, No. 41.—Extract.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 25, 1867.

9. So much of Special Orders No. 65, paragraph 3, February 13, 1866, from this office, as mustered out and honorably discharged First Lieutenant Samuel E. Rankin, Ninth Tennessee Cavalry, to date September 11, 1865, is hereby amended to discharge him to date October 15, 1865, he having been retained in service to that date under proper authority.

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

[Special Orders, No. 13.—Extract.]

HEADQUARTERS, DISTRICT OF EAST TENNESSEE,
Chattanooga, Tennessee, January 29, 1866.

2. * * * Lieutenant Samuel E. Rankin, Ninth Tennessee Cavalry, will proceed to Nashville, Tennessee, and report to the chief commissary of musters, for muster out. The Quartermaster's Department will furnish transportation.

By order of Major-General A. C. Gillem:

J. M. SOUTHARD,
Lieutenant and Aide de Camp, and Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

[Special Orders, No. 23.—Extract.]

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE TENNESSEE,
Nashville, Tennessee, February 1, 1866.

3. First Lieutenant Samuel E. Rankin, Company B, Ninth Tennessee Calvary, will proceed to his home at Mossy Creek, Jefferson County, Tennessee, and there await the completion of his muster-out rolls. Quartermaster's Department will furnish necessary transportation.

By command of Major-General Thomas:

ROBERT H. RAMSEY,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call especial attention to the second paper which has just been read.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. The date of that order is January 25, 1867.

Mr. HOLMAN. This man is mustered out, to take effect on October 5, 1865. It is now proposed to pay him from that time until February 13, 1866. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] authorized to say that he was engaged in any military service during that time?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. The last order was not received until February, 1866. In the mean time the commanding officer of the army in Tennessee furnished him with transportation to go home and remain there until mustered out, as it was not known that there was any order mustering him out. When the amended order of the War Department came, he reported to the muster-out officer and was mustered out. But he was held in service during this time, and it is but simple justice and equity that he should be paid during the time he was held in service and subject to military duty.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania undertake to say that this man was rendering any military service during the time for which it is proposed to grant him this pay?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I say that there are the orders of his superior officers showing that he was subject to military duty; that he was not mustered out, and that he had not received permission to proceed home.

Mr. HOLMAN. But during this interval between October and February, was he not actually at home?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. No, sir; he was not.

Mr. HOLMAN. Where was he?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. He was at Nashville.

Mr. HOLMAN. But he was not rendering any military service.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. He was on duty. He reported there to a military officer. On the 11th of September his regiment was mustered out of service, and it was supposed then that he was mustered out with the regiment. But it was not so. The War Department in October issued an order that he should be paid for the time between September 11 and October 5.

Mr. HOLMAN. And he was paid?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. He was paid up to that time; but he was not discharged; and the order for that payment did not reach him until February.

Mr. SPEER. What service did he perform from the time up to which he was paid until the time he was discharged?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I cannot say, except that he was subject to military orders and military command.

Mr. SPEER. There was no war then?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPEER. Where he was?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Yes, sir, where he was. There were troops there.

Mr. SPEER. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I did not yield the floor. I move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. SPEER. My motion to adjourn is pending.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I did not yield the floor for any such motion.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen need not dispute upon such a point, because the moment a gentleman demands the previous question and yields the floor, a motion to adjourn is in order. Undebatable motions can never clash.

Mr. SPEER. The Chair is always right in these matters. I would not for a moment suppose the contrary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] demands the previous question; and pending that motion, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr SPEER] moves that the House adjourn.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the regular order.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 42, noes 59.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has a quorum voted?

The SPEAKER. A quorum is not necessary to adjourn or to refuse to adjourn.

Mr. SPEER. But when on a motion to adjourn the fact is disclosed that no quorum is present, can the House proceed with business?

The SPEAKER. The vote upon the next motion will require a quorum. It will be time enough to raise that question when the vote is taken. The question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SPEER. On that motion I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ALBRIGHT and Mr. SPEER were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 119, noes 30.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 118, noes 28.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. CONGER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have not yielded the floor. I desire to say a word on the motion. I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, that in the confusion of the Committee of the Whole the point presented here has not been carefully considered by members of the House, and that a dangerous precedent may be set by our action upon this bill.

Mr. SENER. I ask whether the gentleman making this motion to reconsider voted in the affirmative?

The SPEAKER. There being no record, the Chair does not know how any gentleman voted.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will yield to me I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to inquire what is the pending question.

The SPEAKER. The bill having passed, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] moves to reconsider the vote by which it was passed. The motion to reconsider of course opens the whole question for discussion in the widest sense.

Mr. ELDREDGE. We can pass this bill at any time. I hope the gentleman will yield for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. The orders relied upon as part of the proof in this case have come before the House at the last moment. As members are aware, these orders were not before the Committee of the Whole at all. There has been no opportunity to examine them. There are gentlemen on this floor who believe that this is not a valid claim against the Government, and that those orders upon examination will so show. Though other gentlemen may be satisfied of the justice of the case, I hold that each member is responsible for his own action and is entitled to an examination of these papers. If they should be ascertained to be what the gentleman from Pennsylvania

(in whose ability and integrity I have the utmost confidence) upon a hurried examination thinks they are, I presume there will be no objection to the passage of the bill. But we desire an opportunity to look into those orders. I will therefore yield the floor to a motion to adjourn if there be no objection.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Indiana should conclude to withdraw his motion to reconsider, that will pass the bill.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] asks unanimous consent that the only remaining bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, a bill (H. R. No. 1774) for the relief of Matthias Whitehead, be taken up and acted on at this time.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object. I am perfectly willing the matter should be acted on when it comes up in its order.

The substance of these orders was stated in the report of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I insist on the motion to adjourn.

DAVID R. DILLON.

On motion of Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of David R. Dillon.

Mr. FORT stated that his colleague, Mr. MORRISON, was unavoidably absent from the session to-day, being confined to his room by illness.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move the House adjourn.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 61, noes 49.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Speaker appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. MAYNARD.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 48.

So the motion was agreed to; and the House (at five minutes to five o'clock p. m.) adjourned until Tuesday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BARBER: The petition of W. B. Baxter and others, druggists, of Grant County, Wisconsin, for the repeal of the stamp tax on medicines, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CORWIN: The petition of citizens of Peru, Illinois, that the Northwestern Railroad Company may be required to permit trains from other roads to use the bridge at Clinton, Iowa, upon fair terms, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of citizens of La Salle, Illinois, of similar import, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. EAMES: The petition of Ebenezer S. Cheesebro, of Bristol, Rhode Island, for arrears and increase of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ELDREDGE: Papers relating to the application of B. G. Welch, of Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, for relief for the loss by fire of $300 in United States Treasury notes, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FARWELL: The petition of Margaret Patterson, for a pension, and for pay due her deceased son, William J. Patterson, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FIELD: The memorial of the Wayne County Medical Society, of Michigan, relative to rank and promotion in the Medical Corps of the Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MCKEE: The petition of William Cameron, for the payment of the French spoliation claims, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ORTH: The petition of citizens of Warren County, Indiana, for free banking and increase of currency, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. POLAND: The petition of Luman Case, of Bristol, Vermont, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812.

By Mr. SHANKS: Papers relating to the claim of Philip Pendleton, late paymaster United States Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHELDON: The petition of H. M. Whittemore, for payment for occupation by the United States of a building belonging to him in Indianola, Texas, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SMITH, of New York: The petition of citizens of Steuben County, New York, and Tioga County, Pennsylvania, for a post-route between Addison, New York, and Nelson, Tioga County, Pennsylvania, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WILBER: The petition of hop-growers of Otsego County, New York, for an increase of duty on hops, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 23, 1874.

Prayer by Rev. E. D. OWEN, of Washington, D. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the country celebrates to-day the birth of the grandest character in its history. It has not been customary, I believe, for the Senate to sit, unless at the short session, or when uncommonly pressed with business, upon the birthday of Washington, which occurred yesterday, and is commemorated to-day. I move, therefore, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that out of respect to the Father of his Country the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 24, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 5th instant, a report of the Chief of Engineers as to the condition of the breakwater at Du Luth, and the amount necessary to put the same in repair; which, on motion of Mr. RAMSEY, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 27th ultimo, information in relation to the treaty of February 22, 1855, with the Chippewa Indians, and the proceedings under the act of June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to perfect certain land titles therein described;" which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of Bradly & Metcalf, and many others, merchants and manufacturers of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, remonstrating against any expansion or inflation of the currency; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair also presents a memorial of the Wisconsin Leather Company, Cramer, Aikens & Cramer, A. M. Thomson, and many other citizens of Milwaukee, which is brief, and the Chair will read it:

Your memorialists, citizens of the city of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, respectfully petition that the national banking act be so amended as to forbid all banks from paying or receiving interest on balances; to require all banks to keep their own reserves and surplus in their own vaults, thereby preventing the accumulation of the funds of the country in one center, and causing it of necessity to be loaned for the wildest speculative purposes, to the great injury of all legitimate business; also, to forbid all banks making any on demand or call loans, for the reason that no legitimate business can be conducted on money borrowed on call, and that all such loans are made only for speculative purposes and for wild stock-gambling, thereby demoralizing our finances and diverting money from the uses for which it was intended, to wit, the conducting the legitimate business of the country; and your petitioners will ever pray.

The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOWE. Is that a petition signed by a single firm?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. O, no; it is signed by many. It is signed by the Wisconsin Leather Company, Cramer, Aikens & Cramer, Hon. A. M. Thomson, Smith & Chandler, F. F. Adams & Co., A. Dahlman & Co., Timothy Dore, John Plankington, and a large number of the most prominent and influential business men, merchants and manufacturers, of Milwaukee.

Mr. HOWE. Those are very respectable names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCOTT presented resolutions of the select and common councils of Philadelphia, approved February 20, 1874, protesting against the passage of the act authorizing the lease of the Old Lazaretto site on Schuylkill River, Philadelphia, for a powder magazine; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in relation to the sale of timber on the school and swamp lands embraced in the Red Lake and the Leech Lake Indian reservations in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of a number of letter-carriers of Boston and other cities in New England, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in favor of a post-route in the counties of Lyon, Yellow Medicine, and Lac qui Parle; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, presented the petition of Margaret A. Hoffner, widow of Richard J. Hoffner, late acting master United States Navy, asking to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented a memorial of citizens of Chatham County, North Carolina, remonstrating against the passage of the bill providing for detaching Chatham and other counties from the western judicial district of that State, and adding them to the eastern judicial district of the same State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWE presented a resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River and tributaries by constructing sheer-booms at bridges; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the construction of a ship-canal around the Falls of Niagara, on the American side, for the purpose of cheap transportation; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE. I also present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin of the following tenor:

Resolved by the senate, (the assembly concurring,) That it is the sense of this Legislature that the policy of removing the Indians of this State to proper reservations in the Indian and other Western Territories and States be approved, and we request that the removal may be continued until all the tribes are removed from the borders of the State.

In asking that this resolution be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, I wish to make one remark, and that is that I know of no policy yet which has been sanctioned either by the State or by Congress touching the removal of Indians from the State of Wisconsin except in reference to one tribe, or the fragment of a tribe, which had no reservation in the State of Wisconsin, had no land whatever there, but had a reservation outside of that State in another State, and Congress made provision to remove them from a State in which they had no lands to a State in which they had lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and be printed.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of H. Foote and other citizens of Brodhead, Wisconsin, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KELLY presented the petition of E. C. Bramard and 456 other citizens of Oregon and Washington Territory, praying for the passage of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad bill, introduced by Senator MITCHELL; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented the petition of R. B. Markle, a citizen of Oregon, praying payment of five years' full pay for services rendered by his grandfather, Charles Markle, as a captain in Armand's Legion during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. SCHURZ. I present the petition of merchants and citizens of Chicago, representing that they view with alarm the propositions before Congress for increasing the volume of the United States notes, and praying for an early return to specie payments; and further, that the greenbacks already issued out of the so-called reserve shall be withdrawn as speedily as possible. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, relating to the necessity for legislation in behalf of the Mission Indians of California; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, accompanied by a copy of a letter from citizens of Shasta County, California, to Hon. J. K. LUTTRELL, of the House of Representatives, representing the suffering condition of Indians in that county, and inclosing an estimate of appropriations necessary to aid them; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a report of Special Commissioners Powell and Ingalls, relating to the condition of the Ute and other Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I also present the memorial of the Indians residing near the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, in the State of New York, protesting against the passage of House bill No. 1053. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the question of printing, I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut, what is the nature of the bill against which these citizens protest?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It is a bill with reference to the leasing of their lands by these tribes. These memorialists protest against the confirmation of the leases made by the Indian tribes to railroads and individuals.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not know but that it was like another petition that had been presented here this morning, where the Legislature of a State thinks the Indians had better be all driven out of that State.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Nothing of that kind.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And if New York had come to that conclusion, and all the other States and Territories should, it rather struck me the Indian would have to go where I believe it was Pope put him, in the clouds, and stay there; and perhaps he could be better fed there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition of the members and congregation of the New York Port Society's church, of the city of New York, signed by the Rev. E. D. Murphy, pastor, and other officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented the petition of J. J. Patterson and other citizens of the State of North Carolina, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the following resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed:

Preamble and joint resolution relating to relief for homesteaders in case of conflict of title to lands with railroad corporations.

Whereas there are existing in this State many cases of conflict of title to lands between homesteaders and railroad or other corporations claiming title under legislative grant; and whereas experience has clearly proved that individual homesteaders are too often unable to claim their rights in a contest with such corporations; and whereas a bill is now before Congress, introduced by Hon. J. W. MCDILL, of this State, to confirm the title to the land in such cases in the homestead settlers, provided they make satisfactory proof that said settlements were made in good faith, and by the action and authority of the local land officers in said land districts: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby respectfully requested to use their influence in favor of the passage of said bill, or some act having for its object the confirming of the title to the lands in such cases in the homestead settler.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to forward a copy of this preamble and joint resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Approved February 13, 1874.

Respectfully forwarded.

J. T. YOUNG,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Samuel Adams, praying compensation for making explorations of the Colorado River of the West, from 1863 to 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented five petitions of a large number of citizens of North Carolina, Good Templars and others, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of the United States, praying for the repeal of all laws exempting church property from taxation in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Peter H. Clarke and others, citizens of Ohio, members of an association known as the Lincoln Memorial Club, praying that the birthday of Abraham Lincoln may be declared a legal holiday; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of W. B. Thomas and others, citizens of Richmond County, North Carolina, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the petition of Seth W. Faunce and other citizens of Kingston, Massachusetts, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of A. M. Eastman, W. H. Chapman, and other citizens of Charlestown, Massachusetts, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of William Wickersham, a citizen of Boston, Massachusetts, praying an extension of his patent for an improvement in sewing-machines; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition from creditors of the Boylston Fire and Marine Insurance Company, a corporation now insolvent, owing to the great Boston fire of 1872, in which they set forth that among the assets of the corporation are so-called "Alabama claims," to a very large amount, and they insist that by well-known and perfectly established principles of law recognized in all civilized countries, they by subrogation are entitled to all that the original holders of the ships lost might have had, and they ask that their right be recognized by Congress in the adjustment of that fund. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of Samuel H. Smith and other citizens of North Carolina, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying the substitution of arbitration as a means of settling international differences in lieu of war; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of the State of Vermont, numbering 7,000 members, signed by the officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. OGLESBY presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago, signed by 270 of its members, praying Congress not to authorize any further issues of irredeemable paper money of any character or description, and stating that, in their opinion, it is the duty of the Government to provide for the retirement and cancellation of so much of the legal-tender issue as has been put in circulation from the so-called forty-four million reserve; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADLEIGH presented the petition of Samuel B. Lodge and others, praying for the establishment of a post-route from Francistown, New Hampshire, to Greenfield, in the same State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Hamilton Wiley and others, praying for the establishment of a new post-route from Fryeburgh, Maine, to East Conway and South Chatham, New Hampshire; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of citizens of the United States, soldiers of the late war, and the heirs of such, praying to be allowed one hundred and sixty acres of land, and for the equalization of bounties, pensions, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of A. L. Talmedge, George Ward, and other citizens of Rockaway, New York, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ALCORN presented the petition of members of the Board of Trade of the city of Columbus, Mississippi, praying an appropriation by Congress for the removal of certain obstructions in the Tombigbee River, from Pickensville to Fulton, in Itawamba County, Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of J. C. N. Robertson, a citizen of De Soto County, Mississippi, who was one of General Jackson's old Tennessee volunteers in the war of 1812, praying that his name may be placed upon the pension-rolls, and that he be permitted to draw his pension from the passage of the act of 1871, allowing pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALCORN. I present the memorial of S. W. Weims, master, and John G. Montgomery, secretary, of Durant Grange, No. 184, of the State of Mississippi, in which they represent that they recognize the supremacy of the General Government, and that with it alone rests the power to redress all national grievances; that they are impressed with the belief that the agricultural interest is the true source of our national prosperity, and that it should be encouraged and protected by both national and State legislation; and they further represent that they are impressed with the importance of a uniform system of transportation, regulated and made permanent by the action of the national Government; that the railroads are to-day the great means of transportation, the common carriers for more than two-thirds of the people of the United States, and the farmer is dependent upon them to transport his cotton and other products to market and return his freights, said railroads being in most cases monopolies, wholly uncontrolled or restricted by legislation, either State or national; that they charge most exorbitant and ruinous rates of freight, and make unfair and burdensome discriminations between the large cities and termini and local points along their lines, all of which is calculated to impoverish the country and militates directly against the farmer, as the cost of transportation falls upon him. The memorialists further represent that the railroads are chartered by the Legislatures of the several States through which they pass, and in the State of Mississippi are not restricted in their charges by law; and the memorialists pray for the establishment of a uniform system of transportation and tariffs, established and regulated by the national Legislature, to which end they ask for the creation of a bureau of railroads and transportation, invested with full powers to regulate and control all the common carriers of the country.

I move the reference of this petition to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM presented the petition of John D. Paylon and other citizens of Thomasville, North Carolina, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NORWOOD presented a resolution of the Legislature of Georgia in favor of the construction of the Atlantic and Great Western Canal; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN presented a memorial of Hon. Ichabod Goodwin and 22 others, citizens of New Hampshire, praying that a survey may be authorized to ascertain what repairs are necessary to the sea-wall at Smutty Nose Island, near the harbor of Portsmouth, New Hampshire; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CRAGIN. I also present a petition of citizens of Washington, District of Columbia, asking for a change of the inauguration day of the President, and for other purposes. As the petition is very brief, I may be pardoned for reading it:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the subscribers, citizens of the United States, do, for various good and sufficient reasons, ask to have the term of the short session of Congress extended into the month of May, and that the inauguration day of the President of the United States do hereafter be on the second Wednesday of May, instead of the 4th day of March; and we desire that all appropriate and necessary legislation be had to carry out the objects of this petition.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLANAGAN presented the petition of citizens of North Carolina, Good Templars and others, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAMERON presented resolutions of the city councils of Philadelphia approved by the mayor of that city, remonstrating against the passage of a pending bill giving the Secretary of War the right to lease a part of the public grounds in that city, known as the Lazaretto site, for a powder magazine; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the petition of the members and congregation of the First Universalist church, of Canton, Massachusetts, signed by Rev. Edwin Davis, pastor, and other officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of J. Madison Wells, praying to be allowed to present to the Court of Claims his claim for cotton, sugar, and molasses taken by the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of citizens of North Carolina, Good Templars and others, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LOGAN. On Friday last I presented the petition of 1,190 citizens of Chicago, praying for an increase of the currency. I now present the petition of 1,967 respectable citizens, business men and others, of the city of Chicago, making the same prayer; and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STOCKTON presented the petition of the First Presbyterian church, of Blairstown, New Jersey, signed by the pastor, Rev. Thomas A. Sauson, and other officers, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

A bill (H. R. No. 1759) for the relief of Henry S. Welles.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 429) creating an additional land district in the Territory of New Mexico; and

A bill (S. No. 493) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Arkansas.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 458) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make compensation for certain services therein mentioned, to report it back adversely. I merely desire to say that the subject seems to the committee one not proper for the determination of Congress or the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Treasury, but eminently fit to be decided by the courts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Hanson Harmon, praying compensation for office rent for an office occupied by him as clerk of the district court in the State of Delaware, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill, (S. No. 527) for the relief of Hanson Harmon.

The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1393) providing for the assignment of judges in the Territories, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 92) relating to the several courts in the Territory of Dakota, and the bill (S. No. 276) relating to the several courts in the Territory of Dakota, reported adversely thereon, the subject being covered by the general House bill just reported; and the bills were postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 415) granting a pension to Bartholomew Diggins, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Adrian S. Lee, of Vermont, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1401) granting a pension to Penelope T. Heald, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 510) granting a pension to Thomas R. Hardwick, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 293) authorizing the sale of a portion of the Fort Leavenworth military reservation to the Kansas Agricultural and Mechanical Association, for fair grounds, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of War to Senator SCHURZ, accompanying a copy of a petition of officers engaged in the Modoc expedition, and of a letter of the governor of California, asking that Acting Assistant Surgeon B. Semigs, United States Army, be appointed to a commission in the line of the Army, with a view to his being placed on the retired list, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1932) for the relief of Frank M. Kelly, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 154) for the relief of William Stoddard, late assistant quartermaster United States Volunteers, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1585) for the relief of the heirs of Seth Lamb, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1405) for the relief of Victor Mylius, of Macoupin County, Illinois, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SPRAGUE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 512) to extend the time for completing the Wisconsin Central Railroad in Wisconsin, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 971) to forfeit to the United States certain lands granted to the Placerville and Sacramento Valley Railroad Company, to aid in constructing a railroad from the town of Folsom to the town of Placerville, in the State of California, reported it without amendment.

SEMINOLE ANNUITIES.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1923) authorizing the payment of annuities into the treasury of the Seminole tribe of Indians, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back with an amendment. It is very brief, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It authorizes the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the sanction of the Secretary of the Interior and the President of the United States, in distributing and paying annuities, interest, or other moneys now due, or hereafter to become due, to the Seminole tribe of Indians under the provisions of the eighth article of the treaty between the Creek and Seminole Indians and the United States, concluded August 7, 1856, to expend the same for such objects as will best promote the comfort, civilization, and improvement of the Seminole Indians; or in his discretion, with the sanction of the Secretary of the Interior and the President, to pay such annuities, or any part thereof, into the treasury of the Seminole nation, to be used as the council of the same shall provide, instead of paying the money per capita according to the terms of the treaty; but the agreement shall provide that the sum of $7,500 shall be annually appropriated out of the annuity to the school fund of the tribe; and the consent of the tribe to such expenditures and payment shall be first obtained.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs was to strike out, in line 18, "$7,500," and insert "$5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 528) to protect the navigable waters of the United States from injury and obstruction; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 529) to authorize an appointment in the Inspector-General's Department; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 530) granting a pension to Peter Harder, late of Company I, Seventh Regiment Michigan Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and, together with the papers in the case before the committee at the last Congress, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PEASE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 531) to endow Reneau Female University and six normal schools in the State of Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask leave to introduce a bill granting the original $100 bounty and the fifty dollars additional bounty to a few men of a New York regiment, who enlisted in the regiment a few days after its organization, which regiment was enlisted and served for two years, and nearly all the soldiers of that regiment received both original and the additional bounty; but there were some few of them, perhaps a hundred, who enlisted a short time after the organization, on the march here, who served out their time, were mustered out with the regiment, served twenty-two and a half months, and, because they did not serve from the day of the organization of the regiment, were cut off from both bounties. This bill is introduced for the purpose of granting these men the same bounty that others of their regiment received, as they were in all the marches and all the battles with them together. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and printed.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 532) in relation to bounties; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 533) granting a pension to Uriah W. Briggs; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT. In connection with the petition and papers of Samuel Adams, introduced this morning, I ask leave to introduce a bill for his relief.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 534) to pay Samuel Adams for services rendered in exploring the Colorado River and its tributaries; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask leave to introduce a bill, which I do by request, for reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I accompany it with the letter requesting its introduction.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 535) for the relief of Robert Murray, jr., of the State of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up a House joint resolution of about six lines, which it is very important should be disposed of at once. It is House joint resolution No. 52, explanatory of resolution approved January 31, 1868, entitled "A resolution limiting contracts for stationery and other supplies in the Executive Departments to one year."

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is too important a matter, and violates what we thought was a great reform only a few years ago, to be taken up in the morning hour, with only twenty minutes of it left. It requires much more careful consideration.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am sure the Senator mistakes the character of the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will be kind enough to hear me through. It is too important to take up at this time. It looks to me a little as if we were going back to the old habits a little too fast; first a chip here and then a chip there, and so on, and presently, at the rate we are going on, it would seem that we shall be almost as bad as the democrats were when we tried to rectify things by taking matters out of their hands. We did reform all these matters of contracts for stationery, &c., and endeavored to make the reform thorough, and I believe we did pretty thoroughly. Now my friend proposes to modify a certain part of it. It may be that it would be right. I cannot discuss that question now, because the merits of the bill are not before us; but I do say that, involving as much as that does—for if it is done for one Department it must be for all in similar cases—it ought not to be considered now.

Mr. RAMSEY. I simply desire to make an explanation after what the Senator has said. Heretofore the Post-Office Department made contracts of four years' duration for mail-locks, mail-bags, postal cards, postage-stamps, &c., that required a large investment of capital. Congress passed a resolution in 1868, which this resolution proposes to amend, requiring contracts for supplies for the Departments to be made annually. The Post-Office kept on as formerly, supposing that the resolution did not cover these cases; but finally the solicitor of the Post-Office Department has determined that it did; and now they come to Congress asking to be relieved of the necessity of making contracts every year for mail-bags, mail locks and keys, postal cards, postage-stamps, newspaper-wrappers, &c. That is all there is in it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not discussing the merits; I cannot now.

Mr. RAMSEY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution which has been indicated.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 19.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry to be obliged to take up any of the time of the Senate by calling for the yeas and nays; but gentlemen do not seem to take any interest in this question. I cannot reply to what my friend has said about what the Department wishes, for that would involve the merits of the bill; but I merely wish to state what the contents of the bill are, to show the impropriety of proceeding to dispose of it at this time, with only a very few moments left of the morning hour. There are other bills on the Calendar, which will lead to less debate, which can be disposed of before the expiration of the morning hour. The bill provides that we shall reverse the positive policy of the law that has been in force now since 1868, a period of six years, and give to the Post-Office Department the right to make long contracts—any length it pleases, if this bill passes in the way it stands. But I cannot discuss that of course in this motion, as it relates to the merits. There is no limitation if you repeal this. And I say that inasmuch as it involves a question which in respect to continued expenses would go to all the Departments—and if you give it to this one you must give it to all—it involves the consideration of the whole policy of the Government on the subjeet, and it ought not to be pressed upon us with only fifteen minutes to consider it. My friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] is more familiar with the subject of the reforms which we have undertaken upon these topics, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, than I am, and I can safely leave it to him to advise the Senate on the subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If this is an innovation upon the act of 1870, by which we undertook to control all this kind of legislation, I should be extremely sorry to see the bill passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind the Senator that the merits of the bill are not open to discussion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well, sir. It is impossible for me to tell whether it is an innovation upon that act or not. I do not like to make an opposition to the measure without knowing something more about it. If my honorable friend from Minnesota will allow the bill to be passed over until to morrow, so that we may have an opportunity of really seeing how it does affect it, I should be very glad to have that opportunity. I do not like to make any opposition.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have no objection to letting the bill go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to withdraw the motion. The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will now report the first bill on the Calendar.

LIQUOR-TRAFFIC COMMISSION.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic.

Mr. SCHURZ. When this bill was up for consideration about a week ago I obtained the floor upon it, and was interrupted by the expiration of the morning hour. As I am to speak to-day on the financial bill before the Senate, it would be somewhat inconvenient for me to express my opinion upon this bill before proceeding to speak upon the other. I do not wish to impede the progress of the bill, nor to remove it from its place on the Calendar, and I shall be willing at any time, when the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] desires to go on with it, to express my views. I ask that it be postponed now merely as a personal accommodation.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand that the Senator from Missouri desires that this bill may go over by reason of his connection with the question that comes up after the expiration of the morning hour, and he asks, as a matter of personal accommodation to him, that it shall be passed over. I understand that it will not lose its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not.

Mr. WRIGHT. And it will be the first bill on the Calendar to-morrow morning. I certainly cannot resist the request of the Senator from Missouri under the circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside if there be no objection.

CLERICAL FORCE OF GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 109) to reoganize the clerical force of the General Land Office.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to the present consideration of that bill. It involves a great many other questions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects, and the bill will be laid aside.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 19th instant, approved and signed the act (S. No. 367) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the State authorities of Rhode Island a certain gun.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Committee on Privileges and Elections have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

EDWARD H. CALVERT.

The bill (S. No. 395) for the relief of Edward H. Calvert was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment to Edward H. Calvert, of the District of Columbia, $1,500, to be in full and complete payment of rent for, and damages done to, his property on Good Hope Hill, in the District of Columbia, known during the late war as Fort Wagner, and occupied from 1862 to the end of the war by Federal troops.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 29th of January:

The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and accompanying papers for the relief of Dr. Edward H. Calvert, of the District of Columbia, report:

The petitioner shows that in the year 1862, and for some time previous thereto, he was the owner of eleven and three-fourths acres of land situated on Good Hope Hill, in the District of Columbia, on which there were a good dwelling-house, stable, and carriage-house, a large greenhouse, and an orchard of about two hundred select and thrifty trees; and that said tract was inclosed by a substantial plank fence. He further shows that in said year the military authorities of the United States took possession of said property, and built thereon the fortification known as Fort Wagner, and, in the process of constructing said fortification, destroyed all the above-mentioned improvements, except the dwelling-house; that also in said construction the earth was thrown up and the surface of the land disturbed; that said fort was occupied by the Federal authorities until the close of the late war; that petitioner was loyal to the United States Government during the late war; and that he has never received any compensation for the injury done to his property. The petitioner claims damages, and asks compensation to the amount of $7,000. The loyalty of the petitioner is proved by the affidavits of R. H. Williams and Dr. William B. Butt, of the city of Washington, D. C., who claim to have known him intimately during the period of the war. Some four parties, to wit, Joseph I. Jenkins, Harriet Richardson, J. N. Osborne, and George Calvert, make affidavit as to the occupation of the property and the damages caused thereby, and, in the main, verify the statement of petitioner, but vary very widely as to the amount of damages, stating them from $2,500 to $7,000, the amount claimed. The records of the Departments show that no compensation has been paid to the petitioner for the occupation and damages aforesaid.

This petition was presented to the Senate and referred to this committee at the second session of the Forty-second Congress. A bill was then reported recommending the payment of $1,500, which passed the Senate June 3, 1872, was reported to the House of Representatives, and there referred to a committee, in whose hands it remained.

The committee think the claim of petitioner, as well as the estimates of his witnesses, much too high, and therefore recommend the payment of $1,500 in full compensation for rent and damages, and report a bill in accordance therewith, and recommend its passage.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What committee does the bill come from?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not object.

Mr. DAVIS. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JULIA A. SMITH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 217) granting a pension to Julia A. Smith; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia A Smith, widow of Charles B. Smith, late a first lieutenant in the Fifth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HIRAM W. LOVE.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 398) for the relief of Hiram W. Love.

Mr. WRIGHT. With the consent of the Senator from West Virginia who reported that bill, and in view of the fact that there is some additional evidence in the case, I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator refers to my colleague, [Mr. BOREMAN?]

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

The motion was agreed to.

CALEB A. LAMB.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 42) granting a pension to Caleb A. Lamb, late a musician in Company E, Forty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BENJAMIN FARLEY.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 387) granting a pension to Benjamin Farley, Company C, Fifth Indiana Cavalry; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Pensions reported the bill, with an amendment in line 4, after the words "pension-roll," to strike out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and at the end of the bill to insert the following:

And that he be allowed a pension at the rate of thirty-one dollars and twenty-five cents per month on account of having lost the sight of both eyes in consequence of exposures and hardships while in the military service of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOWE. That is an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. SARGENT. Is there objection to the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair supposed, as it was a very long bill, there would be objection.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not hear any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be reported if there be no objection.

Mr. BOGY. I object.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think my friend from California will have any other opportunity to pass the appropriation bills unless in the morning hour. [Laughter.]

Mr. SARGENT. I must confess I am discouraged a little in getting at this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, and the next bill will be read.

HENRY C. CAREY.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next business on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 259) to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Henry C. Carey.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over.

Mr. WEST. How did that bill get up before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It came up in regular order on the Calendar.

Mr. WEST. Then apparently we have jumped from the order of business No. 64 to No. 81; and where are the bills reported between 64 and 81 that have been passed over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was an accident; the Clerk turned the wrong leaf; he will now turn back.

WILLIAM E. PRINCE.

The bill (H. R. No. 1225) granting a pension to William E. Prince, of Iowa, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Willian E. Prince, late private in Company I, Twenty-third Regiment Missouri Volunteers, and pay him a pension from the date of filing his application for the same with the Commissioner of Pensions.

The Committee on Pensions reported an amendment to strike out at the end of the bill the words "date of filing his application for the same with the Commissioner of Pensions," and insert the words "passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH WHEATON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 418) for the relief of the administratrix of the estate of Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, deceased, which was read. It is a direction to the Third Auditor of the Treasury to settle and adjust the claim of Susan Dayton Anderson, administratrix de bonis non of the estate of Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, deceased, for the half-pay due him under the act of Congress of October 21, 1780, as a lieutenant of infantry in the Rhode Island line during the revolutionary war; and in the settlement and adjustment of the claim, the principles recognized and embraced in the decision of the Court of Claims of the United States in the case of Thomas H. Baird, administrator of Dr. Absalom Baird, deceased, and which was sanctioned by an act of Congress approved August 18, 1856, are to be accepted by the Third Auditor as the basis on which such settlement and adjustment shall be made.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a report in that case? I should like to hear it.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. JOHNSTON on the 3d instant:

The Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Susan Dayton Anderson, administratrix de bonis non of Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, deceased, report:

That at the second session of the Forty-second Congress a report was made in this case, which, as it embodies all the facts, is now adopted by the committee, and is as follows:

The Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom were referred the memorial of the administrator of the estate of the late Lieutenant Joseph Wheaton, and the letter of the Secretary of the Interior of the 27th of March, 1872, relative to the same, report:
